Dedication

To Norman J. Nelson

Who in the administration of his duties as Assistant Principal of the Central High School, through his keen insight and sense of values, has shown unerring discrimination between the genuine and the artificial, between those things that are significant and those things that are trivial; who has evinced at all times a friendly disposition to hear both sides of a question, and to make prompt decisions based always upon principle, never upon impulse; who, by the breadth of his interests and his enthusiasm for everything fine, has been a stimulating force among us—and who, by virtue of all these qualities, has won our respect and admiration, the graduates of Nineteen Hundred and Twenty-eight, with heartfelt regret at his departure, and with the utmost confidence that his future will be marked by success at every step, gratefully dedicate The 1928 Brecky.

Foreword

Just as in ancient days men in quiet seaside villages watched, fascinated, the slow, stately progress of a ship across the horizon; just as they felt sudden wonder at its beauty and a longing to sail with it to vaguely-dreamt-of lands, so men in this day pause in a busy street and look up when they hear the whir of an aeroplane engine. They watch the passing of the plane until its wings are blurred, shrunk, lost. When they lower their eyes they still see it going on and on, over strange seas and mountains and cities. And they, too, long to go with it.

For the aeroplane means to them what the ship meant to the men of another time—romance. Its wide, free curve across the sky has an almost passionate appeal to men who live in the cramped modern cities. They see in it the something beautiful they have never attained, the something glorious they yet mean to do. The old restless spirit of humanity wakes in them and finds some satisfaction in these conquerors of the air.

The young men of today have their eyes on the heavens. As the boys of an earlier generation used to run away to sea when the desire for adventure became too strong; as they idolized the pirate captains of story and history, so boys now talk about the planes they will build, so they idolize the great aviators of present fame. Aviation is the industry of youth—it is more; it is its great adventure.

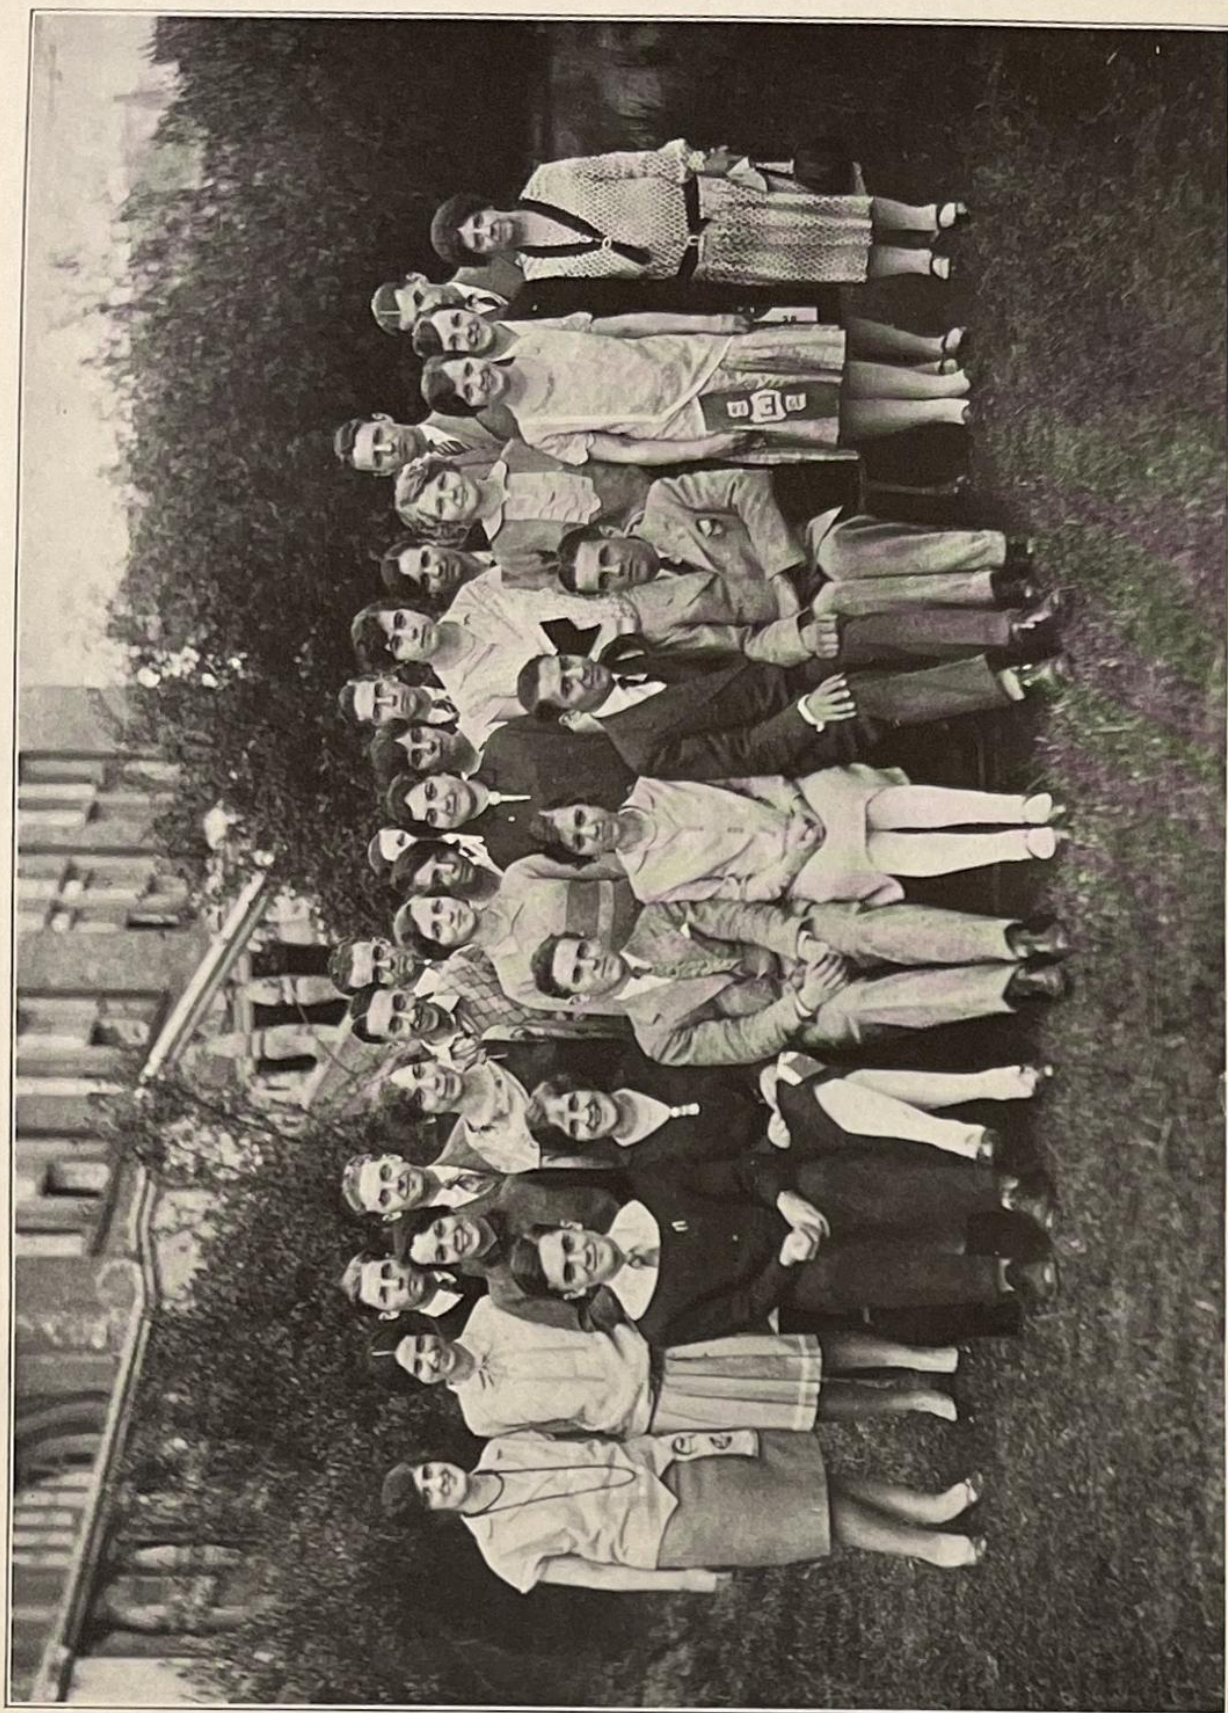

The poetry of the present is written in the skies. No greater epic poem than the flight of Lindbergh has ever been conceived. Its service to aviation was psychological. It may not have made aviation safer or more feasible; it may not have provided an immediate air route across the Atlantic, but it showed to a world a little tired and cynical, a world starved for a new dream, the romantic possibilities of flying.

New dreams mean the beginning of a new world. We, who are young, have been granted this dream. And because aviation seems a symbol of the aspirations of youth, because it is young when we are young, and will grow as we grow, because it has added so much color to this world of ours, we have chosen it as the theme of the 1928 BRECKY.

To the Graduates of the Classes of 1928

ITHIN the covers of this book are those reminders, either in picture or in word, of the many happy experiences of your high school days, which I hope will ever rekindle within each of you that fine spirit of loyalty to "Central" that you have so splendidly manifested in innumerable ways. Also, the theme of this book expressing the spirit of aviation will be a reminder, to you of outstanding achievements in world progress accomplished during your high school days, which I hope will be inspirational to you in your endeavors throughout life.

Those qualities of courage, daring, perseverance, sacrifice, and unselfishness, which have led to the conquest of the air, are qualities which are essential to true success in any endeavor. The name of one American youth of unsullied character, who accomplished during your high school days probably the outstanding aerial achievement of all time, is the embodiment of all these qualities, and stands as a symbol of inspiration to all of the youth of your generation.

"Central" can stand as a great institution only as its graduates reflect its greatness in the nobility of their lives. True loyalty to "Central" means living in accordance with the ideals she has endeavored to inculcate within you. My sincere wish is that each one of you may realize to the fullest extent all of your hopes and aspirations to the honor of yourself and "Old Central."

ALVIN W. MILLER.

MR. ALVIN W. MILLER, Principal

MISS HELEN M. COOLIDGE

To the Boys and Girls of 1928

Who remain at Central after your graduation will often look through the pages of this BRECKY, and the biography section will bring back to us recollections of you as we have known you in all the varying phases of school life—distinguishing yourselves in your classes (or being extinguished), gathering in chattering groups at recess, hurrying from one recitation to the next, but always enjoying to the utmost every moment of these activities as well as games and assemblies, plays and parties. And as I think of you at this Commencement time, I find uppermost in my mind congratulations for you as you receive your diplomas, and the hope that this event will not mark the close of your association with Central. You will come back to us often in future years—the future for which I give you every good wish.

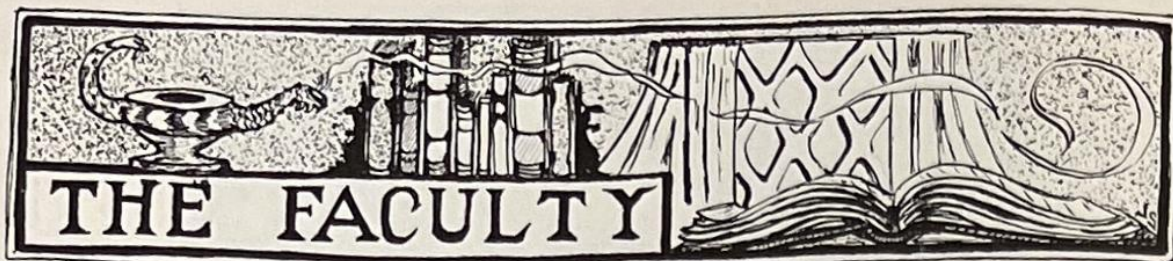

HELEN M. COOLIDGE.

MR. NORMAN J. NELSON

THROUGHOUT the country it is probably true that the event of greatest local interest in the month of June is High School Commencement. By nature of the size of our school, the contribution you make to the full measure of graduates is large numerically and we, scrutinizing you with eyes that may be fond but that are also critical, are able to say that in quality, too, your rating is highly creditable. The school has seen to it that you have met our prescribed requirements; for a moment you enjoy the unique feeling that you have finished a job. Some of you will not again be set to a task that is so definite in its phases; you will be left to your own resources to prove your worth and the credit or blame that you win will reflect very directly upon your previous training. If you have affection for your school, perhaps this will serve as a spur to your future accomplishment. As you leave us, will you take with you, in addition to our good wishes, the hope that your progress will prove your training.

NORMAN J. NELSON.

The Review and Bulletin

PLAYING a vital part in the life of Central High School, the monthly magazine and the weekly newspaper each fulfill an entirely different purpose; yet both meet on a common plane—that of rendering service to the school. The columns of the Review represent the best of the literary and artistic talent of the whole school, while the Bulletin is in the main the product of a group of students trained definitely in the fundamental principles of journalism.

Let us sketch briefly the history of the Review. Central's first so-called magazine was not the Review, but the Weekly, a small pamphlet. It was not until 1886 that the Review came into being, then quite small, but which has now become a magazine of fifty-six pages. It is to Miss Emily Sleman and the late Miss M. Ella Morgan that credit is due for building the Review. In 1917 Miss Florence Murray took charge until September, 1923, when Miss Mildred Stallings became her collaborator. In 1925 Miss Stallings took over the Review and Miss Murray assumed the advisership of the Bulletin only, which position she held until 1926. Upon her resignation, Miss Stallings undertook the task of supervising the Bulletin, and the Review passed to Mrs. Mabel H. Willett.

We are all acquainted with the variety of material which the Review contains—stories, poems, and departments—but few of us realize the significance of it. No doubt each of its faculty advisers has had her own standards and ideas by which she has guided the Review. The present faculty adviser links it with the student in the classroom. From this angle let us consider it.

The Review provides an incentive for doing original work. It offers an opportunity to pupils talented along literary and artistic lines to find an outlet for their abilities. Success in having stories, poems, essays, or illustrations published in the Review leads the ambitious student to seek wider fields for his endeavors. Witness the winning of prizes offered by the Scholastic this year. Most of the winners were members of the Review staff or had contributed material.

Passing to the Bulletin, we find it a publication which belongs to new Central. It began in 1917 as a small, four-page, three-column paper of pamphlet size. In a few years it was increased to a five-column paper of larger size, until 1926, when it was increased to a six-column paper, its present size.

A new feature, the Baby Bulletin, was started on the opening day of school, 1926. The purpose of this issue, which is distributed free to every student and member of the faculty, is to publish the official announcements from the principal's office, and to arouse the interest of the school in the Bulletin. Again in September, 1927, and in February, 1928, the Baby Bulletin was distributed. Another novel feature introduced in the autumn of 1927 was an "Extra" issued to announce the appointment of brigade, regimental, and battalion commanders in the Cadet Corps. The motto, "Keep in Touch," is indicative of the aim of the Bulletin to serve the school and the opportunity of the student body to obtain news. It is published to express the unbiased opinion of the student body, to establish high standards of conduct, scholarship, and sportsmanship, to encourage greater interest and participation in school activities, and to promote stronger cooperation between the students and the administration. It reflects the life of the school along the lines of scholastic interests, major activities—sports, dramatics, debate, cadets, etc.—social organizations, and clubs of all kinds.

Through its editorial columns the policy of the school administration is upheld, worthy projects are boosted, undesirable conditions are criticized.

Turning the pages of the Review and the Bulletin, one may see spread before him the highest product of the literary and journalistic talent of Central for many years past. Names of editors, associates, artists, many of whom have gained fame since they left Central, bring to mind those who have given of their best freely, with "Service" as their motto. As long as future staffs abide by this motto, so long will Central's publications truly serve Central.

Memories of the Gold and Blue

IT IS 1932, in the middle of May. The spirit of spring hovers over all the earth. We are seated in the stadium at the Annual Brigade Review.

There are cheers. We hear the clapping of hands. The band breaks into a martial air, and the old First Regiment swings down the east side of the field in column of squads, turns at the flag, and in column of platoons passes proudly in review of the Army general.

As straight as a saber are their ranks. As gleaming as a silvery hilt is their equipment, and their firm keen step echoes to the edge of a steel-wrought blade. As rank on rank approaches, salutes and passes on, we think that hoary Father Time might well rule his seconds by their precise tread.

Beside us sits a man of moderate years, whose eyes are glistening, and whose hands clench and unclench as though he moved in scenes long since gone by. We are not long left in doubt, for soon past remembrances, aroused by present sights, find outlet in his voice, and though our friend speaks not to us, nor indeed to anyone, but to his own spirit, yet we shall listen to his words.

"Eight years ago, it was. They announced organization day, that morning, in chapel. When the last bell rang that afternoon I ran eagerly to this promenade, and there, with a group of boys unknown to me, we were initiated into the mysteries of the Cadet Corps. An awkward bunch we were at first, but as the weeks rolled on our shoulders squared; we acquired a firmer step; we worked in unison; we caught the spirit of cooperation. Three years passed by, years which told their story of discouragement and hope, of work and play, of defeat and victory, years in which that first group of boys had grown to be my lifelong friends, years in which we crossed the border from boyhood into manhood.

"And then came the last year of all. We were to be officers, leaders in and for old Central. Some whom nature had not fitted for such life had dropped by the wayside; some, with tear-dimmed eyes, had departed to other lands; and others the Great White Angel had borne away in her arms to the Father.

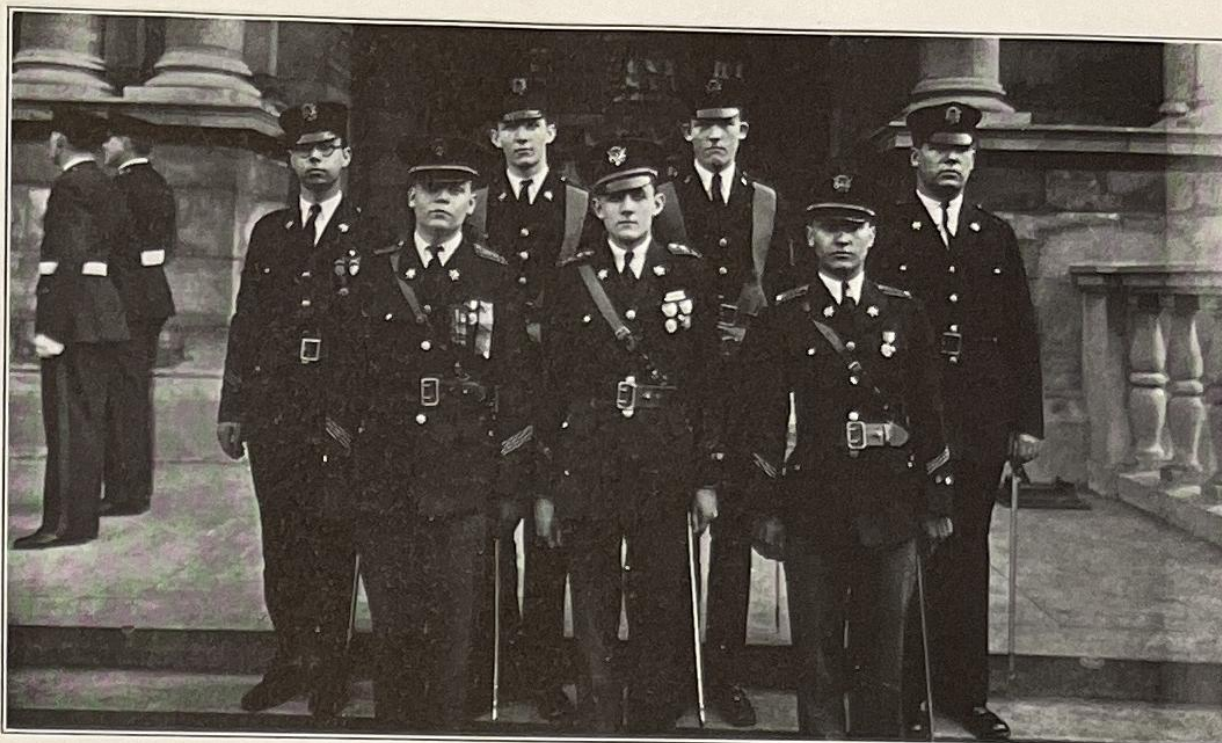

"With tribute in our hearts to these, we stood and received our assignments on a clear, cool day in early October of '27, and there we tasted the sweet reward of all our work. During the weeks that followed we labored to shape our companies for the year's work, interrupted only by our pilgrimage to the Shrine of the Unknown Soldier at Arlington on Armistice Day. There we paid reverent homage to one who might once have worn our blue and gold, and we drank in a full realization of the responsibility laid upon us, to train ourselves and our men for the highest service to our country in war and in peace.

"After this we mingled our work with our play, we drilled hard, and danced gayly, until '27 gave place to '28, and the list of competitions appeared. Throughout all, our war game teams had been imbibing their strategy. During the exciting series we watched with keenest interest the fight our teams were making, and carried joy in our hearts when the colors of old Central marched side by side with Victory's flag, out of the battle smoke.

"Soon there was the Guard of Honor company to be decided, and the First Regiment groomed its companies to take the prize, and so we did! For on the last day of competition, with one company from each school on the judges' list, when all were doing their best, our boys did 'better than their best,' and topped them all.

"In February, for the first time in many years, the First Regiment became ten companies strong, and Central added another hope of winning the Competitive Drill in June, and soon thereafter we learned with satisfaction that Central had taken first and second in the Brigade Inspection.

The National Honor Society

Keystone—the uppermost and last set stone of an arch, which completes it and locks its members together; sometimes used figuratively. The uppermost and last set stone of the Central High School is the National Honor Society; uppermost because it is the highest recognition which can be given to those who are its members; last set because entrance into it is gained at the end of the third or within the fourth year after the four elements which the requirements of the Society comprise have been fulfilled; it is the keystone which locks together its members.

It is all that its name implies, a national honor society. While there are many chapters throughout the United States, they are organized only in those schools with a certain scholastic standing. The Central High School Chapter of the District of Columbia of the National Honor Society of Secondary Schools was organized in 1926, its object being to create an enthusiasm for scholarship, to stimulate a desire to render service, to promote worthy leadership, and to encourage the development of character in the pupils of the Central High School.

To become eligible, a student in the sixth, seventh, or eighth semester must stand in the first fourth of his respective class in scholarship, must qualify in character, leadership, and service, and must have been in Central four semesters previous to admission to the Society. The names of these students are placed on a candidates' list posted in the section rooms of these upper semesters. To qualify in scholarship an average of ninety percent is required. An E is evaluated at ninety-five percent, a G at eighty-five percent, an F at seventy-seven, and a D at sixty-five. In this way scholarship is determined.

Just how well a candidate qualifies in leadership and service is ascertained by a questionnaire which he fills out. On this blank there is a space for names of teachers who each candidate thinks know him best. Slips are sent to these teachers, on which they give their opinion regarding the candidate.

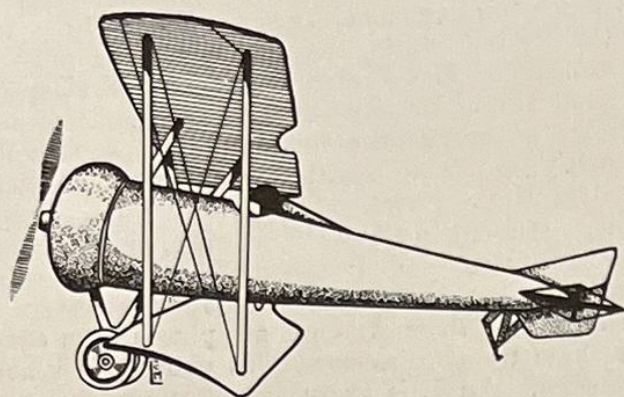

Character is judged from eligibility lists sent to the faculty, who mark with a plus those names they approve, with a minus those they disapprove.

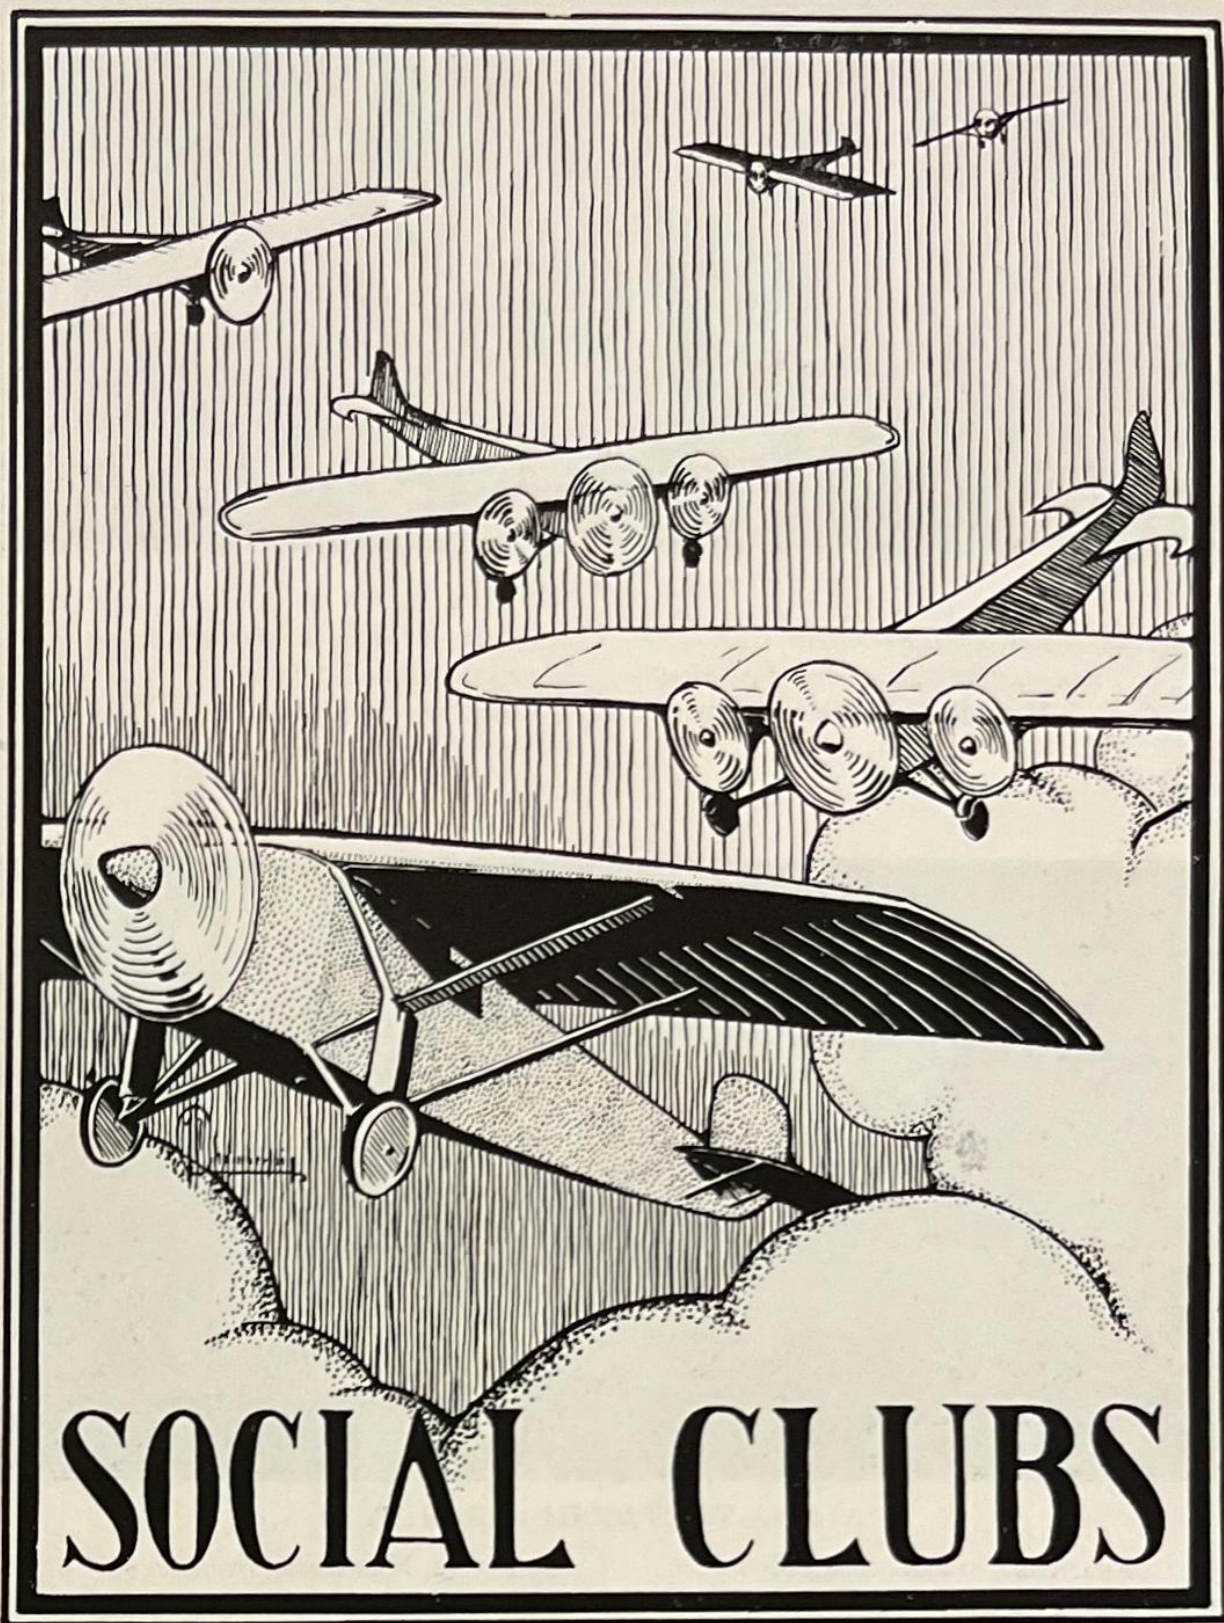

The committee on the Honor Society, after it has considered all these things, meets and elects those students it finds worthy of admission. In an honor society "chapel" these candidates are initiated into the chapter after they repeat the pledge:

"I will be a loyal member of Central's Honor Society, steadfast in my purpose to abide by the right, to serve all just causes, and to seek the truth with my whole heart, both in books and in life."

The National Society has adopted an emblem which each member is entitled to wear. It is a little gold keystone, upheld by a torch. The rays emanating from it symbolize the light of character, scholarship, leadership, and service, the initial letters of which are grouped at the base of the pin. Just above the flame are the words "National Honor Society." Certainly any Centralite who wears this pin ought to realize how great an honor he has received, and, remembering the four requirements which he has fulfilled, should continue to uphold them. As Phi Beta Kappa is to the college, so the National Honor Society is to the high school.

"Man is said to be a sociable animal, and, as an instance of it, we may observe, that we take all occasions and pretences of forming ourselves into clubs. When a set of men find themselves agree in any particular, though never so trivial, they establish themselves into a kind of fraternity upon account of such a fantastic resemblance."

—The Spectator.

Green Caps

"Next!"

The gray-clad beginner hesitates, then shoves off from the tiled wall. Kicking valiantly, she reaches the middle of the pool. Suddenly she falters, flounders around, and begins to sink. There is the shrill blast of a whistle, a flash of green and gray, and a soft splash. A head in a green bathing cap emerges a moment later, and with one swift stroke the rescuer reaches the side of the frightened girl. Slipping a hand on either side of the victim's head, she begins swimming the back stroke, and in a few seconds they reach the side of the pool.

A minute later the rescuer is again standing on the wall, nonchalantly pulling the green cap down over her ears. This green cap, of which she is justly proud, is the magic symbol of Leadership. Few indeed are they who may slip a cap of emerald hue over their locks. Girls in the beginners' or advanced classes may wear caps of flaming scarlet, with rubber thin as gossamer or thick and heavy, caps loose or tight fitting, caps with gay butterflies on the crown or severely plain, caps with or without straps under the chin; but they may not infringe on the sacred privilege of the green-capped Leaders!

To enter this goodly company, a girl must pass certain definite requirements. She must swim ten lengths of the pool, including at least one length of the crawl; she must make a surface dive; she must be able to break three of the most common "grips" of drowning people; she must be able to tow a victim half the length of the pool in both the cross-chest and the head carries; and she must be able to rescue a person sinking close to the wall by leaping in feet first and shoving the struggling one up and over to the wall. In short, while a Leader need not necessarily be a fast swimmer, she must be able to handle herself fairly well in the water.

Upon passing these tests, which are given every autumn, the green-capped mermaids enter upon their duties as assistants to the instructors in the regular swimming classes. Each Leader is required to "serve" two periods a week. At these times she helps to give the beginners a knowledge of the rudiments of swimming, often demonstrating a stroke or a float, and remaining always in readiness to rescue a struggler in deep water. This work is excellent training for the Leaders and is found to be intensely interesting.

A visitor in the pool room after school on Thursday may find a row of green-capped girls, wrapped in sweaters, perched on the benches at the deep end of the tank. Stirring notes from the cadet band are heard intermittently from outside. At a signal from Miss Moody, guardian of the natators, four girls divest themselves of their wraps, dive into the water, and swim rapidly across and back until stopped by a blast from the whistle. They clamber out, and another four take their places. One girl hesitates at the turn, and receives carefully reiterated instructions in the details of the crawl turn. Approaching the wall, she must touch it with one hand, sweep her other arm towards her waist, taking a breath as she turns, with head up, away from the side of the hand that touched, and bringing both feet against the wall for the shove off through the water. This turn, practiced conscientiously, results in a quick bit of action, so smoothly and efficiently made that a layman would never guess its intricacies.

It is in the patient training of such minor points as this, in the gradual perfection of racing starts, plunges, diving, and the details of arm stroke, kick, and breathing, that our fair swimmers attain the endurance, form, and lightning speed with which they demonstrate their proficiency in the meets.

There is usually a "C" meet toward the end of every semester. To earn her "C" a girl must win eight points in a meet. Taking first place in any event counts five points; second place counts three; and third place one. No girl is allowed to enter more than six events. The height of excitement is reached on the second day of the meet, when the finals are run off. Then the winners of the previous day join in a series of closely contested races and form competitions. Great is the rejoicing when it is known what lucky ones have earned their letters or numerals.

The Game

The seething mass of humanity seethed and massed. The tumultuous multitude tumulted happily. The heavens scowled disapprovingly at the scene in the stadium below, but no one paid the slightest attention. Let Jove hurl his thunderbolts—who cared? This was the great day; the day for which thousands had waited with mingled emotions of hope and fear, regardless of the fact that scientists say we can have no mixed emotions. In a short time, the skirl of a tin whistle would start twenty-two “iron-hearted warriors” struggling desperately over the possession of a muddy, slippery ball. In plain, ordinary words, it was the day of the Tech-Central football game.

The Rookie, as he sat in the midst of the huge crowd in the stadium, slid nervously about on the bench; then suddenly he wished he hadn't. He had forgotten about the splinters on the seats. The Rookie wondered if it would be a good game. He hoped it would be, but he couldn't see any reason why anyone should get all excited about it. He did not care much who won. Like all of his kind, the Rookie was inordinately curious, and he stared interestedly at the scene about him.

Down in front, a group of boys, whose blue sweaters were adorned with an awe-inspiring “C,” were striving to reserve, by foul means or fair, the first three rows of seats for the beloved faculty, which, somehow or other, failed to make an appearance. Practically everyone in the western half of the stands was armed with a blue and white megaphone, through which he bellowed pleasantries to a friend in some more remote section of the stadium. The band blared defiantly, in an attempt to drown the noise.

Pieces of chalk, choice bits of humor, and spitballs floated over the crowd. The Rookie felt out of the picture as he listened to the talk of those around him.

“I say, Perry, give me your megaphone. That voice of yours is——” “Who threw that chalk?” “Do you boys belong to the ushers' union?” “Would you mind taking your foot out of my pocket until I get my handkerchief? Thank you!” “Who threw that?” “C'm'on, start the game, I'm here!”

Suddenly a swarm of blue-clad players dashed out of the dugout. The crowd cheered wildly; the cheerleaders skipped up and down, their lung-splitting whispers sounding ever so faintly through the bedlam. Then Tech's team made its appearance. The referee called the opposing captains to the center of the field, where they greeted each other with grim, tight-lipped smiles. A coin spun into the air; there was a moment of hesitation; then the choice of goals was made. The teams were lining up, while the cheerleaders pleaded hoarsely: “Everybody up on the kickoff!” As if anyone COULD remain seated at that great moment.

“Are you ready, Captain Simmons?” It was Referee Magoffin's voice, sounding clear and calm through the tumult. Then the skirl of a whistle putting twenty-two forms in action; a “thud” as boot met pigskin, and the ball sailed end-over-end through the air. It dropped downward, was smothered in a pair of gray-clad arms, and was rushed back down the field behind hastily formed interference. The crash of bodies coming together; the whistle again; and the shrieks of the frenzied mob resounding like the thunderous roar of a mighty sea! The great game was on!

“Nice work in there.” “Get that guy.” “Don't let him—Ah-h-h, he's down!” “Hold 'em!” “Get some fight in there!” “That's the way.” “Big Brecky for the——” “Tech's going to kick.” “Nice catch, Everett.” “What's this?” “Central's going to kick.” “Only first down!” “Look at that ball go!” “Down on Tech's two-yard line.” “They're going to punt.” “The wind's blowing the ball back.” “Ault recovered it for a touchdown.” “We've SCORED!”

The Rookie, as the teams lined up for the kickoff, was adding his shrill treble to the din, and his pulse was racing madly. He wondered why.

Well, Once Upon a Time

*"I must down to the seas again, to the lonely sea and sky,
And all I ask is a tall ship, and a star to steer her by!"*

—JOHN MASEFIELD.

Well, once upon a time (my tale's begun
The way the greatest stories always run)—
A bent old witch did spell her curse on us
And that is what is raising all this fuss.
"All Publication Folk, who leave in June, Must write a funny yarn." So would she croon

As bending o'er her tripod she did stir.
Well, anyhow, the joke will be on her
When we have made you jealous as can be,
Relating our great journey to the sea!
We didn't really reach the sea, but then
We made a start—our leader, Major Ben.

It happened on a sultry, summer day,
They made us write. (Our hair almost turned gray)—

I don't think that we really meant to shirk,
But then the day was much too warm for work.
As time was hanging heavy on our hands,
I had to give them fun at their demands
(For at that time I was a Quill Clique goat)
So haply I did think on father's boat.

"Say, friends," I cried, "I can not bear to see
Great woe in such a goodly company!
Then forth, stout hearts, I'll take you for a ride,

We'll have some fun, whatever fate betide!
So grab your duds, for there's no time to lose."
Now smiles began to grow. They'd lost their "blues."

And out we rushed with merry, carefree mind—

Toothbrushes, hats, and rubbers left behind!
(Dear reader, do not deem us all unwise;
Our mothers were not there to supervise.)

"The street cars and the busses poke along,"
Was all the burden of our cheerless song
Until the club our watchful eyes espied.
"Hurrah, the boat club's reached at last!" we cried;

And on we rushed, a happy, noisy horde,
And off we pushed, when we were safe aboard.

Dick Moore, our famous "Iggy," helped me run
The motor, and I grasped the wheel 'til one,
When Bob cried, "Hey, my kingdom for a meal!"

Then Anne and I to give him a square deal
Did cook our very best. And after lunch
(Of which we all had had at least one munch)
We sped on down the river until dark

And there off Indianhead we thought we'd park
For supper, anyway. "But for the night
I'll anchor in the cove upon our right."

But there arose the clamor once again;
"We're hungry," yelled our leader, Major Ben.
Again Anne helped me fill those girls and boys,

And so we put an end to all their noise.

"Say, Dave, I dare you crown the silly fool
Who said we must do galley proofs at school!"
So merrily Lee Anna Embrey spoke;
We couldn't help but laugh as at a joke.
Quite gayly then we talked the evening through,

Discussing things that we would like to do,
While from the near-by, darksome, eerie bogs
There came the deep-voiced chorus of the frogs.

While overhead, the purple sky did hold
The twinkling stars all cast from purest gold.
Now, when our heads began to nod, we said
Good-night to one and all and went to bed.
The sandman came and filled our eyes with sleep,

While in our bunks we rocked upon the deep.

When morning gilded all the skies at last,
Our men escorts woke hungry from their fast
And came and pounded on our cabin door.
"Oh, girls, do have compassion, we implore!"
We tried to get some breakfast for ourselves,
But everything was lost on those old shelves!
"Poor dears, we'll try to help you if we can—
It always takes a girl to help a man!"

As Gwen did chance to be the first one dressed,
She got some apples for the worst oppressed;
I'd like to have you know J. D. was first
To eat his apple and to quench his thirst.
Miss Audrey Belt came next upon the scene,
Disporting her bright bathing suit of green.
Lee Anna's suit was scarlet in its hue,
While all the boys appeared in navy blue.

Well, after all the morning work was o'er,
We launched our bright canoe and made for shore.

And after we had swum and dived a while
J. D. proposed a race for half a mile;
"Beginning near the shore swim quickly out
Till you have reached the boat, then turn about,

And swim your best. Remember that the prize
Will make the winner's fame mount to the skies!"

Now, see how tense the racers have become.
J. D. has pressed the trigger with his thumb.
The gun has flashed—they're off—the race begins.

A thousand cheers for him who bravely wins!

See, Dave has reached the yacht before the rest,

And J. D. wonders who will prove the best.
He watches them in this, their last mad dash.
As in and out their arms all quickly flash.

"Hurrah! Gwen's won!" our J. D. shouted loud,
"The prize—the lasting friendship of this crowd!"

"Then give three cheers and one cheer more for Gwen!"
(The ladies shout, "To think she beat the men!")

"Dear friends, away! We've had our morning sport, Let's go and see the shooting at the fort!"
So Bob and Dave hauled in the anchor chain,
And close we followed in a steamer's lane.
We'd go up high like prices, then we'd fall—
But darn! The weather man has sent a squall.
A rush upon the cabin stairs, and lo,
We've made ourselves quite comfy down below.

Now, first we thought we'd have a peanut race.
In this great stunt our J. D. set the pace.
Well, next we bobbed for apples in a tub,
When suddenly we heard a little blub.
Ignatius Foghorn, P., what does this mean?
(Ignatius Foghorn, P. looked most serene.)
The boys squealed, too, when we discovered him—
I mean Dick's turtle—taking his first swim.

"All hands on deck," I yelled, "the rain has stopped!"
And out as fast as possible we popped.
Oh, what a welcome sight our eyes did greet.
Those Navy men, when shooting, can't be beat!
Now, fearing that we'd miss the show, we took
A table and our lunch on deck, "But look!
Why, Ben, that man just shot a perfect score!"
"Gee whiz, had I a gun, I'd shoot lots more."

"Well, Ben, you throw the dishes overboard.
As paper plates are all we can afford,
We'll make our dishes targets for our aim,
If you would like to have a shooting game."
"Come on," they yelled, "we'll help you get the shot.

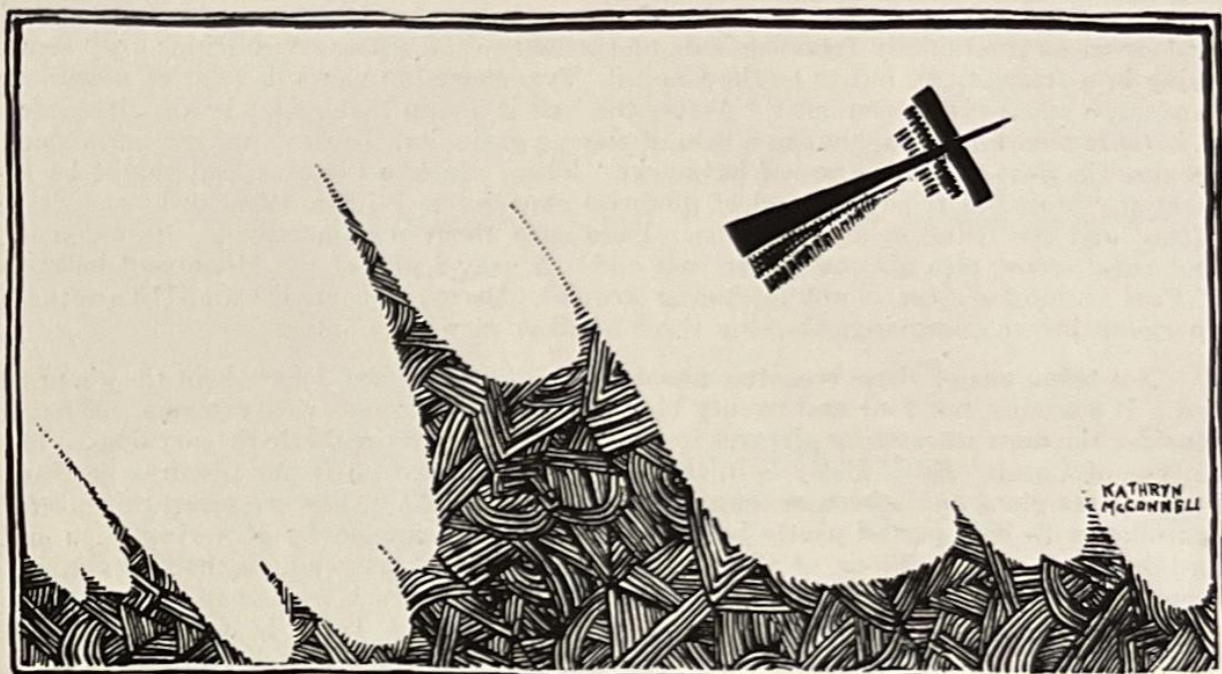

"But what about the rifles?" "I forgot,
They're in the locker underneath the stairs;
They're only two, so we must shoot in pairs."

Now, when we'd shot till all our match was done,
Our Dick pranced round and screamed, "I've won; I've won!"

And in his joy he pulled the anchor in,
Then started up the motor with a grin.
So up the river once again we sailed,
With ginger ale and pretzels now regaled,
We sat in easy chairs and laughed or sang
Till all the echoes by the river rang.

And once the Norfolk steamer passed us by
With people dancing on her decks so high.
How beautiful the river banks did seem
When we stole softly past as in a dream,
While only lapping waves the silence broke!
The sky now donned her soft blue evening cloak
And in her hair she wore the crescent moon.
Two fleecy clouds served for her silver sheen,
As bravely on against the tide we flew,
And winds our gallant yacht now homeward blew!

CHARLOTTE JAMIESON, '28.

Central's Album

For ages untold (or for a long time, anyhow) America's Favorite Indoor Sport has been delving into family albums. I deplore, that with the advent of short skirts and bobbed hair, this fine practice has fallen into disuse. Nowadays they play guessing games to keep the feeble-minded amused; in those days they took out the album. Nothing satisfies the kid craving in you for a peep show and Punch and Judy combined like the family album, and no pins asked for admission, either. In the good old days it was a matter of keen competition and family honor to have on hand for emergency entertainment three or four books containing the really outstanding family freaks. One's standing in the community depended upon the number of comical characters to be produced on demand.

Anyhow, what I started out to say was, that if the Great Indoor Sport should be revived, Central can hold a peep show with the best of them. Our album is spread over the walls of the three floors, and anyone may laugh in a lunch period.

Since I have been working on the BRECKY, the Demon "System" has me in its grizzly clutches, so I will be systematic and present the pictures to you by floors.

The third floor has very few pictures. Few people are energetic enough to climb up there, and the poor students are too exhausted to look (propaganda for an elevator). They are engravings in soft browns and grays. There is one of the Hudson River and West Point, and a three-in-one of Harvard. The others are not very interesting.

The Spring Play was not the only thing around school to harbor a Dragon. The second floor does, too. Perhaps that is a little misleading. There is a picture there entitled "Charge de Dragons a Cravellotte." Pictures on the second floor show a wide and varied selection. Across the hall from each other are King Arthur's peaceful knights and the Victims of the Reign of Terror! Serenely side by side are Roman ruins and the Embarkation of the Pilgrims. Far from the madding crowd (on the back walls) may be seen college pictures—Yale, Colgate, Cornell.

You may not have noticed it, but the nearer we get to the first floor, the more plentiful the pictures become. Those on the first floor near the office have been chosen with an eye to visitors. They are beautiful pictures in soft, lovely colors.

Since I am, as I said before, in the clutches of a demon, I will begin at the west end and progress irrationally from one side of the hall to the other. A soft blue-gray something in a frame turns out to be the Capitol. Two charming views in color of a country landscape and a river come next. Across the hall is a ship that might be Old Ironsides. A little farther on is one showing a field of waving grain, but the wave was not permanent, because the next picture is one of haystacks. There are two pictures that might be almost anything, but from my fund of pictorial experience, I judge them to be the State House and the Seine in a snowstorm. I am sure about the snowstorm. Ships, snow, and rural scenes also abound in the east end. A gray study of the Monument looks as if Carl Sandburg's cat might be hiding around. Between rooms 111 and 113 are three enormous brown engravings showing three familiar views of Central.

Not being one of those eccentric people who eat dessert first, I have kept the pie until last. It contains, not four-and-twenty blackbirds, but four-and-twenty teams. What I consider the most interesting pictures in Central are hidden in the back corridors. The tintype of Coach "Bill" Foley is in the east end, and next to it are pictures of track teams (champions and otherwise) dating from 1897 to 1920. They are posed in graceful attitudes, with hair parted neatly in the center, and surrounded by glittering cups and medals. There are millions of pictures (almost) covering baseball, football, basketball, swimming and track, but the claim for antiquity goes to a track team that I thought was dated 1404! The west end harbors mostly football heroes. There is one picture with twenty-eight heroes strung out in a row! Another has its manager dressed in an overcoat! The fashion in hairdressing for the football team seems to have been rigidly ad-

The Lost Alibi

PLACECentral's Wall.
TIMEA spring Saturday morning, one-half hour late for rehearsal.
CHARACTERSThe Boy.
The Girl.

(As the scene opens, The Girl enters and walks slowly with head down; she is the very picture of despair, and some great artist would be glad of the opportunity to view such genuine gloom. A whistle is heard and The Girl stops suddenly, seemingly anxious to do anything but continue on her mournful journey. She lifts her head and turns around. The Boy enters. He also is the very spirit of dejection. His speech belies his actions and expressions—merely the habits of speech of the Spring Play cast.)

The Boy. Hail, fair one.

The Girl. Hail yourself, and see how you like it.

The Boy. On a morning like this it is a crime to go in there and rehearse.

(They both gaze slowly, longingly, lovingly, and mournfully at nothing. Slowly, very slowly, The Boy mounts the wall. Slowly, very, very slowly, The Girl follows suit. Both heave a sigh and continue to gaze at nothing.)

The Girl. I ought to be at a dancing lesson, and this (she pauses momentarily) breaks up everything.

The Boy. It breaks up my special Saturday morning sleep!

(The Girl and The Boy throw a sigh.)

The Girl. (Making no motions of action) We're late.

The Boy. (Making no motions other than to make his position more permanent) And here's one little boy who is going to be later.

The Girl. But—— It isn't quite right.

The Boy. I'll say it isn't right to get us up here on Saturday mornings. They'll be calling rehearsals on Sunday, next thing you know.

The Girl. (Still holding her concrete posture.) Remember, we're doing it for the school——

The Boy. Yes, I suppose.

The Girl. And this will be our last Spring Play——

The Boy. I suppose.

The Girl. And we ought to go just to satisfy the coaches.

The Boy. (Trying to think up an alibi for not going in.) Suppose I was terribly sick! Then I couldn't go.

The Girl. (Still weighting down the wall.) More and more I think I ought to go in—I know it!

The Boy. (Seeing things turning against him, gropes for another alibi, and from long practice finds it.) But how about your lines—do you know them?

The Girl. Well——

The Lost Alibi

The Boy. (With finality.) Neither do I.

The Girl. (The wall still holding her up.) Oh, but I do know them.
(The Boy takes a sudden dislike to a little bird in the top of the nearest tree, and says so, under his breath.)

Think of the thrill we will get on the night of the performance——

(The Boy watches the ground earnestly. No alibi arrives.) and the honor of the affair. Besides, we've got to rehearse if we are going to give the school a good performance.

The Boy. Yes, that's the part that hurts. I really want to put up a good performance for them.

The Girl. And so do I, and that's why I'll have to go in and rehearse.

(With an effort that would have put Atlas or Hercules to shame, she gets down from her perch and starts to resume her march.)

The Boy. But you can't do it. You'd lose your "it." It just isn't done.

The Girl. What?

The Boy. Coming on time to rehearsals.

The Girl. I've made up my mind. I'm going in, and you should come, too.

The Boy. Nothing doing.

The Girl. Well, you aren't doing anything out here.

The Boy. Nope.

The Girl. Then come in and rehearse.

The Boy. I'm going to finish my sleep—right here. (He lies down on the wall as if to sleep.)

The Girl. You ought to be ashamed of yourself. Why, the Spring Play is one of the biggest events of the school year, and think of all the money it makes for Central! And you quitting—

(The Boy snores mockingly.)

I have no respect for you—you think you're funny, but you're not! I don't believe you'd do anything for Central.

(The Boy comes suddenly to life and sits bolt upright.)

The Boy. Who wouldn't? I'd do as much, if not more, than you would!

The Girl. But you won't go in and rehearse—that's for the school.

The Boy. I can go. (He jumps from the wall.)

The Girl. You should go for your own honor and "for the honor of the school."

(The Boy and The Girl strike a very, very dramatic posture.)

The Boy and The Girl. "For the honor of the school."

(Exeunt triumphantly.)

Sight-Seeing With Elfkin

Central's elf closed the door of the Publications' Office with a sigh of relief.

"I always object to copy days," he explained seriously. "Their noise and bustle seems to detract so much from the scholarly atmosphere of the school!"

"But," I questioned curiously, "why do they allow so much confusion in the office? I imagined the Review staff members, at least, would be seated quietly at their desks while they carefully evolved their 'brain children,' and instead I find them quite as excited as the rest."

The little man laughed.

"Oh! They did their writing days ago. Come on," he invited, "and I'll show you where it's done." With a merry chuckle, he skipped around the nearest corner of the corridor.

I chased after him and managed to reach the auditorium door just in time to see the elf's blue and white, roly-poly figure rapidly turning cartwheels along the alley at the back of the auditorium balcony.

"Wait," I cried entreatingly; "don't go so fast!"

"Elfkin," as I had privately named him during the first part of our exploratory trip around the school building, put the brakes on his imitation of a bicycle wheel (minus several spokes and a nut!) long enough to toss back an impish glance at me (which I caught dexterously) and called, "If you want a peep at Miss Whitford's drama class, you'd better hurry. The second hour's 'most over!'"

I did not bat an eyelash (and I do not believe he could have hit one of them either). Did he expect me to turn handsprings, perchance? Well! I certainly hope I shall never forget my dignity to that extent! Nevertheless, I did hurry my pace a little, especially as I heard from a distance such expressions as: "What an adorable incitement!" "That play of Dick's may have a whole earload of totality of effect, but his verisimilitude—Say! It just isn't there a-tall!"

As I puffingly caught up with "Elfkin," I noticed that he had paused outside Room 318.

I peered inside, and, as I looked, he explained in a stage whisper that this class had been there since February, 1925! I stared at him in astonishment. Could those students really go without rest and food for that long?

But the Central elf noticed my look of incredulity and exclaimed:

"No, no! I mean it—the class—ah—the course was started then. Naturally this one," he nodded toward the door, "has only been going on since February, 1928, as a continuation of the short-story class."

"The short-story group was the first of Central's classes in creative English composition. It was established in September, 1924, and is held from September to February each year."

"Short-story students study the structure of short-stories and write lots of tales for the Review at the same time."

He was interrupted by a burst of laughter from the other side of the door.

Disgusted at such undignified behavior, especially from seniors, I snorted, "It's time this class stopped then. I want to see a class of dramatists, not comedians!"

"Elfkin" grinned. "That's just it!"

"What's just it?" I questioned inquisitively.

"The class," he replied. "It's in there that most of those thrilling mysteries and one-act plays are originated. Miss Whitford's probably conducting a criticism of some original drama now."

"During the semester, the class reads about twenty-five different plays, and each pupil is supposed to write three original ones, too. They don't seem to mind it, though, do they?"

I shook my head negatively. No, they didn't mind it!

With Colors Flying

It was with a pardonable flourish that Janet Lee wrote L8 after her name. It meant that she was—a senior. The thought that she was at the very top of the Central scale was certainly responsible for the supercilious glances she cast on all humble creatures whom she knew to be underclassmen. The rookies gazed with open-mouthed awe, the sophomores were abashed in spite of themselves, the juniors were eager and humble when Janet Lee, L8, walked down the hall. Or so thought Janet Lee, L8.

When campaign week rolled around, and the halls of Central bloomed gaudily with colored posters, and the seniors likewise bloomed gaudily with streams of colored tags, measurable by yards, Janet was one of those so bedecked. There was one tag, however, the gayest of the lot, bright red and diamond-shaped, which Janet did not wear. It bore the inscription, "Reds Marshall for Treasurer." Janet sniffed whenever she saw one of these tags.

Never, thought Janet, would she vote for Reds Marshall. Only a year before they had been the best of friends, and Janet could not disassociate him from any of her memories of Central. He had appeared upon her horizon in his rookie days. He had taken her to her first dance, when she was a sophomore. She had thrilled at games, at drills with him, and had viewed Spring Plays and Fall Revues by his side. It is true that a certain dark-haired youth of Adonis-like countenance, named Courtney Reid, had at times held Janet's interests. But there had never been any serious estrangement until one spring day, when she had emerged from her locker room to see Reds walking down the street with Pat Taylor, a girl for whom Janet decidedly cherished no affection. Other memories paled in Janet's mind before the picture of herself, alone, desolate, by the wall, watching the red head and the brown head move blithely up the street together. She was feminine. She could never forget the injury to her dignity. And deep in her heart was the shame that she had really cared.

What if Reds had stopped paying his attentions to Pat long ago, and had, indeed, made it plain that only a momentary pique had driven him away from Janet? No, Janet felt, she could never forget. And when, one day after school, Reds abruptly caught up with her, and began to talk in the shy, hesitant way he had used when he first met her, she was coldness itself. An uncomfortable silence fell between them, which Janet did not attempt to break. At the corner of Fourteenth and Clifton Streets she said good-bye, although his way coincided with hers. She left him standing there, his hands in his pockets, his eyes wistfully on her, as with careful ease and unconcern, she swung away. She felt that she had snubbed him very gracefully and told herself that she had very much enjoyed doing it. Not for worlds would she acknowledge that she was miserable.

Reds was squelched. He came near her no more, and was evidently disgusted with her sex. He put on a melancholy and cynical air, and, when circumstances brought him near Janet, outdid her in breezy indifference.

A lot she cared, Janet told herself, as the Redless months went by. * * * And now, at campaign time, she ostentatiously told everyone that she was voting for Courtney Reid.

Still, when she actually held the yellow ballot in her hand, she hesitated strangely. She saw Courtney, his hair carefully slick, his complacent smile on his face, standing talking to a group of girls. She saw Reds, his hair much rumpled, his face red and worried, his movements jerky from nervousness, receiving hearty slaps on the back from several teammates. Courtney looked so sure. Somehow the cross on Janet's ballot appeared opposite the name Marshall. Janet told herself she didn't really want Reds to get it. Of course, she was very glad when Courtney was elected. Of course, she experienced ecstasies as she observed Reds, crestfallen and swaggerless, walk out of the room with his friends. But it was a rather forced ecstasy.

With Colors Flying

Everyone said it was the feminine vote which had elected Courtney. But Janet, her cheeks flaming with the thought, knew that there was one feminine vote which had not gone for Courtney.

Beautiful warm spring days rolled by. Spring and a senior! Nothing could be more perfect. And before one knew it, it would be time for the Prom! Janet's mind was full of it as she moved into the music room and sat down in the first row. Reds was in this class. Something made Janet want to look her prettiest as she sat there near Reds. It was not that she wanted Reds to take her to the Prom. Never! It was that she wanted him to be sorry he couldn't take her. * * * Animatedly, she began to discuss the Prom with the girl beside her.

"Rose-colored * * * bouffant * * * yes, Courtney. * * * And I have silver slippers."

Mr. Wood smiled tolerantly.

"Yes, I know, girls, the Prom is a much more interesting subject than lessons. I hate to interrupt you. But—pass the books."

A low, happy murmur of laughter swept through the room. It was fun to laugh. It hardly mattered whether there was anything to laugh about. The warm air drifted through the windows at the back of the room intoxicatingly. It made one want to sing something joyful, triumphant. The spring sunshine filtered in and shone on the gold and brown heads of the girls, the sleek pompadours of the boys, on fluffy pastelle dresses, on straight gray suits, on laughing young eyes and lips. * * *

Suddenly Janet knew that she wanted to go to the Prom with Reds. Then everything would be perfect. Indignantly she downed the thought. At that instant she caught his eye. They both blushed furiously and looked quickly away.

"Page 160," said Mr. Woods. He struck a few chords. Everyone sat up, ready for a chance to let off youthful spirits in inharmonic song. The music soared out gay and martial.

"* * * boys * * * first part * * * girls * * * together."

"Dr-r-u-m-m-te-r-u-m-m" went the piano.

"Oh come, hear the bugle cry-y-ing,
"Come with your co-o-lor-ors fl-y-i-ing,
"Danger and death defy-y-ing,
"We CHEER and march away."

The young, vigorous, boyish voices rang out, carrying everything before them. Janet was swept away by their enthusiasm. She fancied she could hear Reds' voice shouting eagerly, a little off tune—

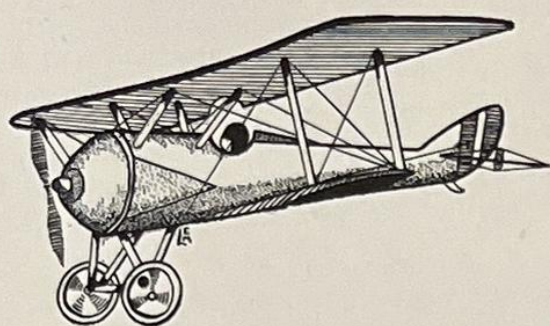

"Danger and death defying."

And suddenly, she was touched; the tears came to her eyes; she could hardly sing, though she had been so anxious to do so, a moment before. They were just like that, she thought—the boys and girls, herself—defying danger and death, colors flying. * * * No matter what happened, they would defy it, they would go on being happy * * * they were young * * * she felt terribly and beautifully her own youth and the youth of the others.

Reds seemed always a concrete image of defiance; he defied everyone; teachers, rival teams, herself. Courtney, with his well-modulated voice, his perfect manners—she could not imagine him as ever being defiant. And—she was going to the Prom with Courtney!

So the night of the Prom found Courtney straightening his tie outside the dressing room as he waited for Janet. Within, Janet was arranging her blonde curls as becomingly as possible. Pat, applying lipstick in front of the mirror, eyed her coldly. Janet, outscorning her, gave her bouffant skirt a final twitch and joined Courtney.

The Spirit of Aviation

"Lindbergh stood forth amidst clamor and crowds the very embodiment of fearless, kindly, cultivated American youth . . . unspoiled, unspoilable. A nation which breeds such boys need never fear for its future . . . America vibrates with glowing pride at the thought that out from our country has come this fresh spirit of the air and that the whole world hails Lindbergh not only as a brave aviator but as an example of American idealism, character and conduct."

(From Ambassador Herrick's Foreword in "We.")

The Mid-Year Class and the Fall Revue

"Lights!" "Ready?" "Now, remember when I say that line, you come in——"
 "All right—curtain!"

The night of the big show had come at last, and members of the cast ran to and fro, shouting last-minute directions, belatedly memorizing passages and cues, and creating a general confusion as the curtain parted slowly to reveal the opening scene of Central's fall show, "Seeing Stars, the Revue of Revues," given December 2 and 3, 1927, in the school auditorium.

Ed Shaw and Raymond Lewis, New York theatrical producers, played by Robert Coltman, the author of the play, and Stephen Trodden, respectively, were in Europe to gather material for their New York revue. Shaw, who had been missing for several months, had returned to tell his partner the results of his quests. He had selected his "stars" from many countries and directed them to meet him at an inn in Normandy, ready to sail for New York; and this troupe of players was to be the cast of Shaw's revue, "The Gypsy Sweetheart."

"East-side" was represented by a Bowery theater, wherein the part of a typical manager, in flashy checked suit, spats, and derby, was played to perfection by Marlow Perry.

His first presentation was an original and perfectly timed acrobatic stunt by Central's Tumbler Team.

Janet Coon, the "humaneanary," rendered a solo, "The Stars and Stripes Forever," accompanied by the orchestra.

A play by George Woodruff Johnston, entitled "The Grill," was next, the hero of which, on the first night of its presentation, was Menzie Pittman, one of the five members of the February, 1928, Graduating Class, who participated in the revue. George Van Kirk played the lead the second night.

Then followed a clog dance, by Gene Stevens; a clever skit, entitled "The Buggy Ride," with Charles and Homer Slade; a violin solo by Herbert Burkhart; and "Three Black Crows," William Buckingham, George Crockett, and Alva Dinwiddie, which was an amusing take-off on that popular pair first introduced in Flo Ziegfeld's "Follies."

Strains of Victor Herbert's "Gypsy Love Song" floated across the footlights to the audience as the curtain opened on the second scene, disclosing a charming and picturesque setting in a gypsy camp. Brightly clad and much-bedecked gypsies wan-

Mid-Year Class History

An account of facts as regards the activities of large organizations, of small bodies, or of groups

The four years we have spent in high school is a period which will live forever in our hearts and minds. As we came to the high school we were instilled by the thought of going a step farther toward that which we desire most—an education. This we realize is essential to the progress of our country, and of the world as a whole.

The greatest trouble encountered by us as individuals was getting adapted to high-school life, a life never to be forgotten; for as we, the graduates, are about to leave this school, we realize the value of our friendships and activities while in this institution.

Our sophomore year is not to be passed over, for it was in this time that we were further inspired to do greater work. It is another of those outstanding years which meant so much to our welfare. The sophomore year of our course was a "Banner Year" for Central. The football team was successful in bringing home the championship. This started the movement to excel in all activities, and truly it was a "Banner Year." A small portion of our class won their C's, while others busied themselves by taking part in dramatics, publications, athletics, cadets, and other activities.

It was during this year that our chapter in the National Honor Society, which is the Phi Beta Kappa, of high schools, was established. The inauguration of this chapter of the society was influential in making us still more desirous of higher standards of scholarship in order that some day we might be among the chosen few who are members of such a great society. The basketball team, to hold to the slogan of "Banner Year," tied Eastern for the championship. The greatest event of the year came in June, however, when two companies of Central cadets marched proudly back to school amid the shouts of the seven other companies. One company was carrying the first-place flag, while the other company proudly bore third-place ribbons.

During our junior year the class as a whole was very active. Many were honored by being admitted to the Honor Society. The Junior Council, along with the Senior Council, waged a campaign for proper conduct in the lunch room. This was very successful.

Before going into the happenings of the senior year, it is my duty and pleasure to speak of the achievements of certain members of the class who have distinguished themselves as scholars. Dorothy Darby, our Valedictorian, has had 90 percent E's during her time in high school. She also was admitted to the National Honor Society. Another active member of our class is Evelyn Harrison. She, too, was admitted into the Honor Society in 1927, and during this same year was awarded the "C" for basketball. She, too, has had 90 percent E's during her time in high school. Warren Moore has had 100 percent E's during his time in high school. He was president of the Junior Council. On December 5 he was elected president of our class. George James, known to us as "Buck," received a "C" for track, and one for football. On December 5 he was elected treasurer of the February Graduating Class of 1928. There are other members of our class who have achieved honors besides these I have mentioned.

Now the senior year. Last spring the Senior Council, with the cooperation of the Junior Council, was successful in instituting a systematic means of keeping the fine appearance of our lunch room. In June, 1927, Central was successful in winning second place honors in the competitive drill. This semester has been marked by many achievements, among which was the "Revue," a very successful work done by the Dramatic Association.

Tonight, as we are assembled for the last time before graduating, we recall many happy hours spent together. Our good work will not end now. We shall go on, still achieving, still pursuing higher aims.

MELVIN N. LOVELESS.

Mid-Year Valedictory

Tonight we are closing the books of our school life here at Central, so let us take an inventory of the assets we are carrying with us. Let us examine the progress we have made, and see if we are satisfied with our present value. Are we fit to take our position in the world?

When we entered high school, four years ago, we were not entirely resourceless. Our parents and teachers in the elementary schools had so taught, trained, and developed our minds and bodies that we were well equipped for our work here. We had learned to observe things for ourselves, to concentrate our minds upon our lessons, to remember what we had learned, and to begin to rely upon ourselves in expressing our thoughts, but we had not yet learned much about reasoning things out for ourselves.

Now, through the experience we have had here at Central, we find that we have grown far beyond our conception of education at the time we started our high-school career. At that time we did not realize the value of a higher education. But now we see, as the result of our hard work, our concentration, our reasoning, and of our earnest endeavor to do our best, a well-trained mind. This is our first asset.

Through the various studies and activities covered in our curriculum, our feeling of good fellowship and fair play has been promoted, and our personality has been developed. Since personality is a great contribution to our real happiness and success, we shall let it stand as the second asset.

However, the greatest asset we take with us as we leave Central tonight is our character. Our other acquirements are of little value if they have not imbued us with a high purpose to be the best citizens of our country, to press forward, on and on, ever looking for a higher goal. And permeating our mental attainments, our personal attractiveness, and our character, and binding them together like the force of gravity, there should be one strong principle that we have learned here—the principle of self-reliance.

As the word commencement implies, we shall soon start out on life's journey, getting a broader view of it every day. Some of us will go to college. Others will immediately turn to a business. But all of us shall soon enter upon life's great stage as actors, and all our actions will be seen as the growth of a nucleus that was obtained at Central.

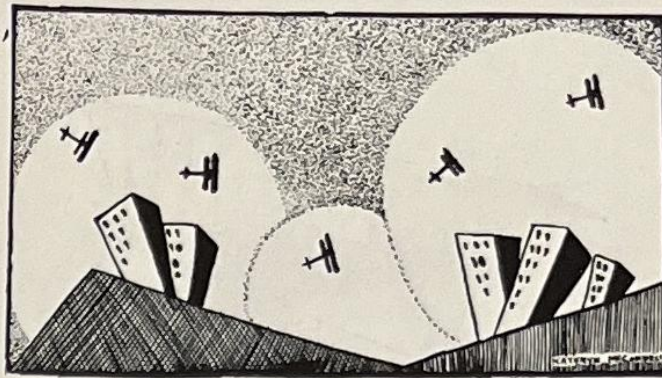

When we shall have begun to take our part in the great drama of life, there is some one that will be missing. Who has been guiding us all these years? Heretofore we have not realized the value of this leadership, but when it will have gone we shall miss it, and know that it was a teacher. So many times we would have fallen by the wayside, but a teacher reached us a helping hand, and we came up smiling, ready to try again. Soon we shall no longer have this aid extended us. Then we shall understand the true meaning of Huxley's words, "A man's worst difficulties begin when he is able to do as he likes." Shall we shrink back simply because we have no help, or shall we press on, putting into practice the principles we have learned here?

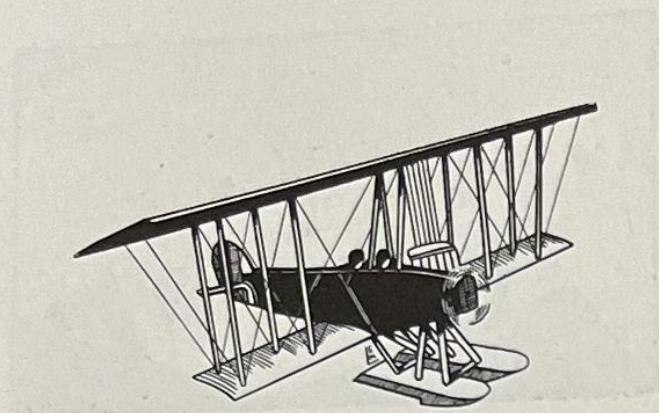

In what better way can we show our gratitude to our teachers, our friends, and our relatives, all of whom have shown an inexhaustible sympathy for us, than by proving to them at this time that they have taught us—self-reliance?

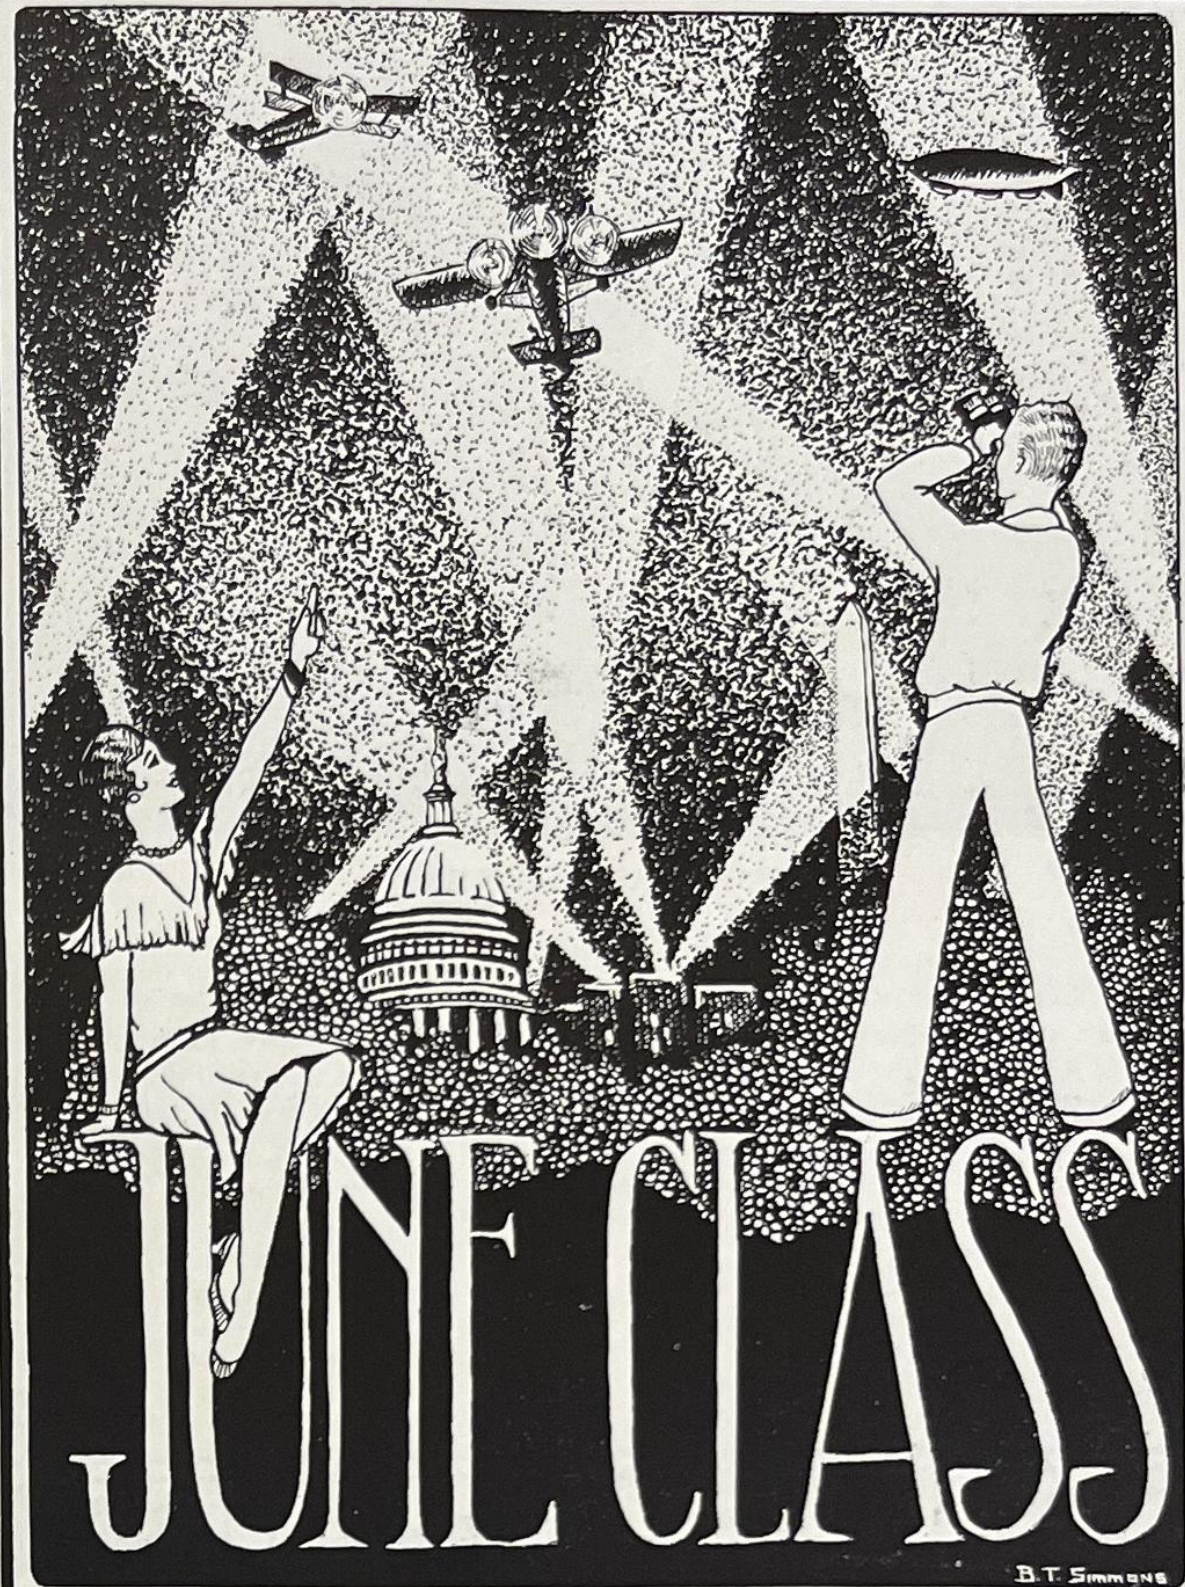

Tonight, as the curtain rises on one of the most important scenes in our lives, we are a body of seniors, looked up to, respected, almost idolized by our lower classmen. When the curtain falls after commencement, we shall scatter, to start work amid new scenes. We hesitate to say farewell to the school, for, as alumni, many of us shall often return. Some of us will go to more distant parts of our country to enter upon the duties of citizenship. Many of us will continue our education by entering institutions of higher learning.

But wherever we may go, whatever life work we may do, we will always carry with us and use those assets which we gained at Central—a well-trained mind, personality, and character, all of which, when bound together, tend toward self-reliance.

DOROTHY DARBY.

June Class History

ARLYLE'S definition of a biography may be applied to the history of a class. To paraphrase his words—if the history of a class recounts in detail all of the events which have occurred, all the triumphs and successes which have been achieved since the class first entered the school, it becomes too much of a dry and uninteresting catalogue; whereas a history which does not contain all these facts is not a true account and record of that class. If a class is really of consequence enough to have its achievements recorded for public remembrance, it is only just that the public be made acquainted with all the influences that have been brought to bear upon it. In a word, what was the effect of the social and academic life of the school on the class, and how has the class influenced the social and academic life of the school?

Now that it is all past, we may look back over our course, see how we were guided so carefully through those first two years, and realize the presence of many of the influences that went into the molding of our characters so that we might carry on when we became seniors as have all the true Centralites that have preceded us. Although that first year we lost Mr. Kramer, the friend who had so heartily welcomed us, yet Mr. Alvin W. Miller soon won the key to our hearts, and we have found in him an able successor. Shortly after our first year began there was formed the Parent-Teacher Association, an organization which has since bound our homes more closely to the school.

In the autumn of 1925 there occurred an event which has meant much to the large corps of cadets at Central. It was then that Major Donovan succeeded to the post of Military Instructor, a position that he has ably filled ever since. Under his guiding hand the Competitive Drill was won that year.

Also during that year, when our ambitions and aspirations were being awakened, we were deeply impressed by the founding at Central of a chapter of the National Honor Society of Secondary Schools, and membership in this chapter has since been one of the goals toward which we have striven.

Our period of preliminary training was then nearly over. It was time for us to begin to take the lead in activities and to show the effect of all the influences with which we had come into contact. Before, we had been influenced by Central; now, it was time for us to make our influence felt and to set an example for those following us. Our junior year was a time of preparation for the honors to come and for upholding the responsibilities that were soon to be thrust upon us. For in a school like Central there is little opportunity for a class to show the results of its early training until its senior year. The bonds of friendship, the love for our school and its traditions, and the spirit of loyalty and cooperation had been instilled in our hearts, and then as juniors we were closely united, working together to live up to the high ideals and standards of Central, striving to better them, if possible.

With this as a background, as seniors, we began the task of perpetuating and increasing the honors which Central had won in the past. Impelled by these motives and fired with the Central Spirit, we have been able to make this one of the most successful years in the school's history. We have given our best, and, although that best has not always been the best there is, we have upheld the standard of sportsmanship and have added to Central's name, glory, and honor.

Although we were tied for the football championship, nevertheless for us it was a moral victory, for we were able to defeat our ancient enemy, Tech. The basketball team, by again winning the championship, kept our succession of victories intact.

Our girls, too, have been active, and the Girls' Rifle Team has won the title of National Champions.

Along scholastic lines, we have been equally fortunate, and have won important scholarships to Harvard, Wesleyan, Pennsylvania, and Dartmouth.

The June Class Poem

THE FLAME

There is a flame that in the hearts of men
Has burned unquenchable throughout the ages,
For as each sinks to his own destined dust,
Cupped in his hands, he gives it to another,
Who, in his turn, as on his path he goes,
Nurses within his heart the sacred flame.

Long, long ago Prometheus stole this fire,
Burning upon the altar of the gods,
And hid it in his heart and fled to earth,
And with its warmth inspired the dullard clay.
Then men, rejoicing, rose with mighty shout
And built great cities, crowned with shining towers,
And raised, like silver banners, sails of ships,
To seek the misty edges of the earth;
And loved the very darkness of the sea,
The very rocks upon the stern-stretched road,
And sang defiance in the face of death,
Armed with their golden sword, the flame of youth.

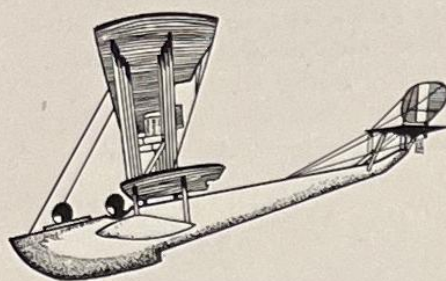

The June Class Poem

And for a space, ours is the sacred flame.
Behind us, centuries have passed it on;
Before us, centuries with groping hands
Reach down for it. But now it is our own
For we are young. We have the eager hearts,
The leaping blood, the glory-dreaming minds;
For us the sea is wide, the mountains lift,
The air spreads mysteries of crystal space.

And if our time is short and all too soon
Our hearts grow cold and we are left with ashes
Of that sweet passion faded—mourn not then:
For every flame that sinks in our hearts' embers,
Upon the altar of another heart
Youth burns anew. And never will the world
Be dark, but will be lighted by that flame.

June Valedictory

TURNING back the mellowed pages of our history, we find ourselves entering this beloved institution young, carefree, and happy, perhaps, but little cognizant of what the future might hold in store for us—forming the first ties of many sacred friendships, and implanting in the depths of our hearts a precious spirit of love and deep affection for our school and its varied interests. The years have passed all too quickly. Life has unfolded itself before our eager eyes, and we have gained some realization of the possibilities that will be ours in the future.

Now our present task is done. We are here on the verge of manhood and womanhood. Life must take on an aspect of seriousness for us. We should step out into the world to follow our own pursuits. As we leave, we wish to express our appreciation of the help and training and advice that our teachers have given us in the course of our studies here. We shall better realize the value of our training when we are forced to depend on it for our existence. We have come to the parting of the ways. Our happy years together have drawn to a close, and we must separate to go on many different paths. Behind us lie treasured memories. Safeguarded and hidden, they will remain in the sacred precincts of our hearts. But they should comfort and solace us in the future when we shall be able to look in retrospect on these days and live anew in the joys of our youth. In them we should find the inspiration to guide us on to greater success and happiness.

Success lies within our grasp. Opportunity calls us in this marvelous age when we can reach greater heights on the ladder of life's material blessings than ever before. We leave but to develop and nurture certain qualities essential to the achievement of greatness.

Vision is an attribute we must possess if we are to succeed. Surely it is apparent that an architect must plan a house before he builds it. Shall we not also plan our lives as far as we are able to do so before we live them? Every great work was planned before it took concrete form. Pilgrim's Progress grew in Bunyan's thoughts while he was in a prison cell. The great "Paradise Lost" formed in the mind of the blind Milton before it was written. And so it is with every great achievement. Where there is no vision, nothing is attained.

To attain our desires we must have a fixed purpose. A definite goal can guide us to success. We must not wait for things to turn up, but must pursue that which we desire. Now is the accepted time for us. It is inestimably wise for one to choose early the thing to do in life. Not only must we have a fixed goal, but we must have the enthusiasm to reach that goal. No one succeeds in any line of endeavor unless his heart is burning with the desire for success.

Another requisite of achievement is faith in oneself. If a person has faith in himself, other people are more likely to have faith in him. Eli Whitney, Alexander Graham Bell, Thomas A. Edison, and all great inventors had enough confidence in their own ability to achieve greatness. All of us can well follow their example in mastering life's difficulties. It is wholly within reason to say that obstacles are only to be overcome.

Shall we go forth with false hopes and the idea of getting something for nothing? It is worth remembering that a thing that costs nothing is worth nothing. We must pay the price of our attainments. Work is one of the rounds in the ladder of success. All men who have achieved have been mighty workers. It is necessary for us to work with infinite care, to keep at our tasks with great persistence, and to cease working only when everything has been finished. There are no short cuts to great achievement.

Character is a priceless possession in any of life's endeavors. In the world of business, or anywhere else, moral force is essential to success. We must try to mold our lives along the line of greatest strength of character. To get results with our efforts, self-denial must be practiced. Self-indulgence and achievement do not go together. Instead it is self-denial and sacrifice that are synonymous.

Central's Troupers—Past and Present

In the autumn of 1886, ten years after the founding of the Central High School, The Review announced the organization of a class in elocution. "A good start in a good direction. We feel that even a start is desirable and may develop into a broader and more comprehensive field in the future" was the comment given by The Review. While this class was being organized, money was needed for Central's activities. In the old school there was no lunchroom. Pupils brought their lunches and ate them wherever they could find a convenient place. Therefore an annual luncheon was served every Spring to raise money. Each boy and girl contributed, yet bought his or her own lunch. Parents and their friends made a point of lunching at Central on that day. Sometimes as much as $900 was made. This event continued annually until 1909. During this time Shakespearean plays were given to help the school funds under the direction of Mrs. Elizabeth R. Walton. The stage at the old school was not designed for plays, and pupils had to make props, scenery, and costumes. Miss Janet Ditto kept the costumes in an old walnut wardrobe. At this time Miss M. Ella Morgan came to Central and she was given charge of designing the costumes, while Miss Ditto and the girls made them. As yet the plays were subordinate to the annual luncheons which were given every year until the entrance into the new building.

On November 2, 1909, a dramatic club was organized, making Mrs. Walton chairman, and Miss Clem I. Orr supervisor of the speaking of lines. In 1913 the Club joined the Junior Chapter of the Dramatic League of America and called itself the Central High School Chapter. There were 61 members in 1914 and a faculty committee consisting of Mrs. Elizabeth Walton, Miss Janet Ditto, Miss M. Ella Morgan, Miss E. Clark, Miss Mildred Dean, Miss Alice Clark and Mr. H. P. Hoover.

The Fall of 1915 brought plays mingled with a touch of sadness to every Centralite. Old Central became a memory. New Central took its place in our hearts. The first dramatic meeting in the new building was held on a Wednesday. The annual lunches were no more for we had one of the largest auditoriums in Washington where Spring plays might be given. And so at last we came to the first Spring play, "The Man from Home" by Booth Tarkington, presented by the Central Dramatic Association, March 20, 1917.

In 1919 when the association had declined, our old friend "Bob" Maurer visited a meeting and promised his aid. The old spirit of enthusiasm sprang up. In March, 1920, the Spring play "The Galloper" by Richard Harding Davis was produced. Mrs. Walton, unable to do much because of illness, spent hours in her room across the street planning a bigger and better association. She was always the steady and never-failing pilot. She retired in the Fall of 1921. Her last message to the association was: "It is my firm belief that everyone is an actor. Some can act one part, some another, but all can act. Thus it is the duty of the Dramatic Association to find that part and give it to the actor, for everyone can do some part well." It was our own "Aunt Sibyl" who took her place, and we who do not remember Mrs. Walton, know how Miss Baker carried on her work. The Spring play for 1922 was "Seven Keys to Baldpate" by George Cohen, a comedy full of thrills. The Spring play for 1923, "Twelfth Night," qualified and Central had the honor of being the first possessor of the Brown University Cup. The first annual vaudeville show was given in the Fall of 1923. "Trelawney of the Wells" was presented as Spring play for this year. It was a costume play of the middle eighties with hoop skirts and wigs. Another successful vaudeville in 1924 and the Spring play "Stop Thief" which left about $1,000 in school funds, put Central on the map. The Fall of 1925, the third annual vaudeville was presented. The Spring play brought forth Maurice Maeterlinck's fantasy "The Blue Bird," Central's biggest production, requiring over two hundred characters. In the Fall of 1926, the Association again started with a new pilot, Miss Margaret Fishburn, who began the year with "Central's Fall Review" and ended it with "You and I."

"THE DRAGON" AND OTHERS

Just Around the Corner

We of the class of 1929, when we realize how soon our junior year will be ended, turn our thoughts toward the future; more definitely, our last year at Central. Pictures appear of the time when we, as solemn, learned, and revered seniors, will traverse the well-known corridors; of ourselves with senior rings, bearing few books, and, since every rose has a thorn, of replacing the physical agony of carrying "twelve tons" with the mental anguish aroused by that small book of terror, Burke; of whirlwind days of campaigning, elections, Brecky pictures; and then, in fast succession, of our Senior Prom, baby day, class night, and graduation, our "fadeout."

But beneath these visions we are realizing that a senior has a responsibility, and we can not shirk our burden. Aside from scholastic duties, from our ranks will come the captains, managers, and the majority of the players on our teams that will seek to conquer in every field, always upholding Central's standard of fair play and sportsmanship; our classmates will edit the publications, command the cadets, and be the dramatic stars. In short, we must carry on, and try to better, the work handed down to us by those classes gone before.

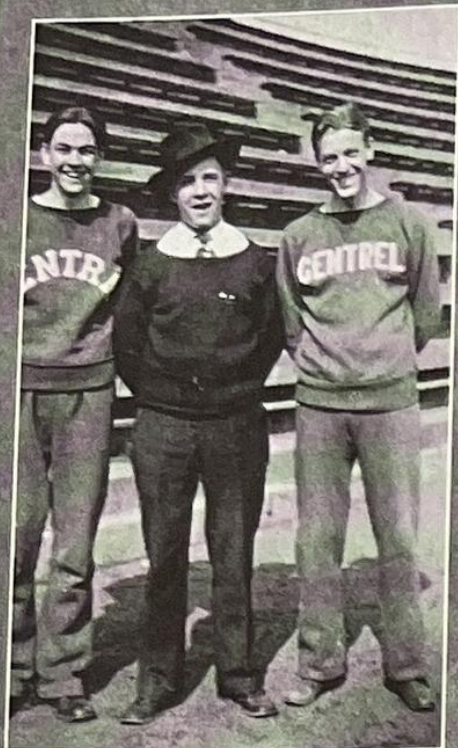

When we came here as young and tender rookies, although "school spirit" was impressed upon us, few of us went out for any activity. This was not entirely our fault, as some sports were not open to first-year pupils, and afternoon classes prohibited participation in others. When we said "we" won this or that (and we said it often) "we" was used à la Lindbergh.

Our sophomore year, our horizon widened and a goodly portion of us enrolled in the many activities. We did not represent our school in contests, but we had a grand and glorious time.

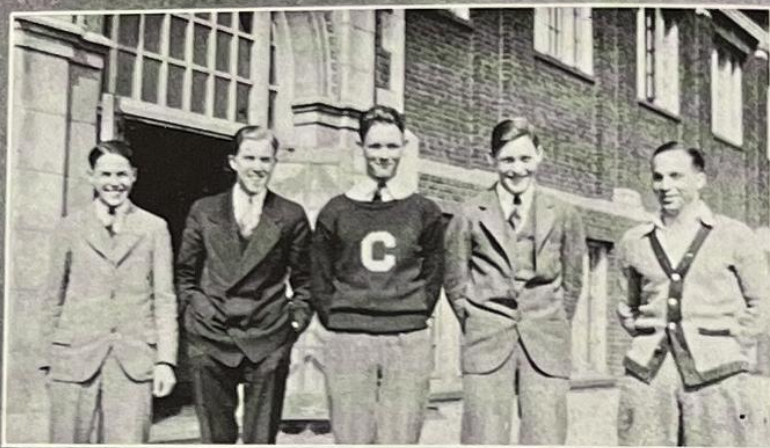

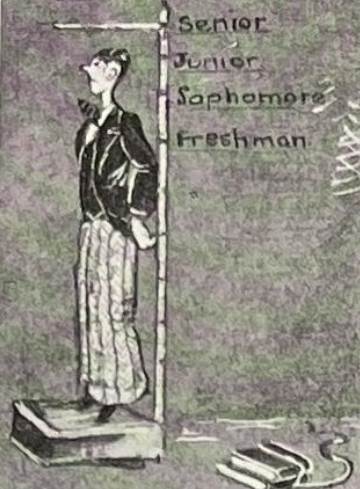

This year, those who had enjoyed a year in athletics, publications, or dramatics, hastened to sign up again, and also by their enthusiasm added many others to the lists. Besides this, we were now upper classmen and had a Student Council. We began to realize how much influence we had and how that influence could be strengthened and turned into the right channels. Our desire really to represent the school deepened our sense of responsibility and made us better representatives. Our part in the life of the school has given us an added sense of kinship and happiness. We feel that we belong and are of some use to Central.

Next year is our last chance. If we have tried hard to give our best, let us try harder for Central's sake. It is up to us to make "school spirit" less of an empty phrase and more of a real, tangible something that binds us together; to do all in our power to carry on Central's ideals. Then let us think over with a new understanding and determination the words of our school song, "Tenax Propositi," and proceed "Steadfast of Purpose."

Bon Voyage!

When we were taking up our new burdens at the opening of the second semester, we missed the familiar presence of Miss Ditto, but rejoiced with her in the pleasant prospect of a leisurely trip through Europe and into Africa, with no school building looming on the western horizon to haunt her dreams. We hear from her occasionally and know that all her anticipations are being realized.

Again we come to the parting of the ways. Three of our number, Mrs. Steele, Mlle. Parrot, and Miss Edna Clark, will cross the threshold with us in June, as we turn our backs upon these solid walls of brick and stone. But before them stretches a sunlit landscape, far as eye can see—a landscape upon which these walls will never again cast their shadow! Our congratulations go with them. The shadow of their going, however, falls upon us. Mlle. Parrot carries with her, across the sea, our best wishes. Mrs. Steele, who remains in the city, we hope to see, as often as she will grant us that privilege, refreshed and rejuvenated by new opportunities to indulge in the out-of-door sport she loves. And we share in spirit Miss Clark's joy in her delightful New Hampshire home.

Mr. Nelson, who is usually a lap ahead of us all, will, as an administrative officer, probably remain a little longer before he closes the door of Central behind him. At the beginning of this 1928 BRECKY we endeavored to express, though inadequately, our regret at his departure, and our appreciation of his services to the school, but we can not refrain from closing this volume dedicated to him, with a God-speed on his way.

The four who are going out from among us will not fully realize their blessings, nor will we fully realize our loss until——.

But we will not anticipate!

Our rejoicing with those who are happily going into other fields of activity and pleasure is tinged with sadness when we think of the members of our faculty who will walk no more among us—Mr. Huntzberger, Mrs. Branham, and Mlle. Piguet—to whose friends and families we wish to express our deepest sympathy, in words as well as in the memorial placed earlier in our yearbook.

The Development of the Constitution

BENJAMIN E. HINDEN

Winner of "Evening Star" Regional Contest

Constitutions are not struck off in a single convention; they are the slow, deliberate work of ages. When the American Constitution was first presented to the people of the several states, they did not receive it as a masterpiece of statecraft. They were human, excitable, and suspicious of the true character of its provisions. Fearing that it was drafted solely to rob them of their liberties, they did not hesitate to employ any means to prevent its ratification. Howling mobs burned copies of it on Boston Common. In Pennsylvania it was denounced as the work of political knaves. In Virginia it was ranked with the Stamp Act and the Boston Port Bill. But in this hour of gloom and darkness there appeared, in the person of Alexander Hamilton, the incarnation of the Constitution. He captured the people of the whole country for the Constitution by his papers in the "Federalist," and conquered the hostile majority in the New York Convention by the splendor of his oratory. And from the hour that the Constitution went into effect, America ceased to be thirteen states, envious and jealous of one another, and became the Republic of the United States.

When, in 1789, the new government created by the Constitution was established, there were in the nation two conflicting theories as to the true nature of the government to be instituted; one, that of a strong, centralized government, independent and sovereign; the other, that of a confederacy of states, responsible only to the states. The question narrowed itself down to this: How much power did the central government possess and how much had been reserved to the individual states? Upon the answer to this question hung the nation's entire future. A crisis in the nation's history was approaching. State supremacy meant national death, while constitutional supremacy meant national life.

The greatest minds of the nation—John Calhoun, Henry Clay, Daniel Webster, and Robert Hayne—could find no solution to this momentous issue. Would all our statesmen fail? Was there no master mind to settle this dispute? Would America add one more to the long list of fallen republics? But beneath all the arguments of our statesmen, slowly, silently, but surely, was operating the force behind the throne. For thirty years there came forth from the Supreme Court the teachings of a master, binding into a perfect system of jurisprudence the chaotic facts and principles of American law. John Marshall sat upon that bench. Through all the issues which rose and fell during three decades, through all the bitter, burning strife aroused in the excitement of the passing day, the great chief justice went steadily onward to the settlement of that paramount problem: Did the United States form a nation? Realizing that the future of the Constitution depended upon the answer to this question, he dedicated his life to its final solution. His teachings form the basis of our political system. He found the Constitution weak, wavering, almost nullified; he left it strong, unswerving, supreme.

Welded together by four years of civil war and four decades of reconstruction, the Union emerged from this conflict with added luster and untarnished integrity. When North and South, Federal and Confederate, beneath the Stars and Stripes marched side by side to victory in the Spanish-American War, success had crowned at last the brilliant struggle for national life.

Competitive Drill, June 4 and 5, 1928

Our "E" Too

When Company "E" of the Business High School Battalion was called before the judges to receive first place in the Forty-first Annual Competitive Drill of the Washington High School Cadet Corps, it was the first time in 14 years that a company from Business experienced that thrill which comes as a fitting award to the company which has reached the highest degree of perfection during the year. As Brig. Gen. Briant H. Wells, Deputy of Staff, U. S. A., pinned the $3,000 Allison Nailor diamond medal on the breast of Captain Israel Silverman, the Business students rose to their feet and gave vent to that ecstasy which they had suppressed for so long.

Another section of the stands was equally thrilled when the Brigade Adjutant turned to the left to march toward Central's regiment for second-place honors.

"Direct Captain Minor Hudson, of Company 'E,' to report with his command to the judges' stand to receive second place," the Adjutant reports. The lieutenant colonel lost no time in relaying the command to the company in question, and Minor Hudson led forth his men. Gallantly they marched across the field and swung into line before General Wells. As Captain Hudson received the coveted purple ribbons, a resounding Brecky rolled across the field in the Griffith Stadium.

Third-place honors went to Company "H" of Western, commanded by Captain Edwin S. Hartshorn, Jr.

A precedent was established this year, when the best February company in the brigade was announced. Company "G," of the Eastern High School, under Captain Max H. Cohen, qualified for this distinction.

First Sergeant Edmund Corley, of Company "A," Central, and First Sergeant George Weber, of Company "B," McKinley, tied for the honor of the "best non-commissioned officer" in the brigade, each receiving a gold medal.

"Pass in review! ! !" The band broke into a stirring march, and battalion after battalion swept by the reviewing stand, where stood General Wells, Colonel Clarence Deeme, Lieutenant Colonel Wallace M. Craigie, Dr. Frank W. Ballou, Superintendent of Schools; Stephen E. Kramer, Assistant Superintendent of Schools; Principal Alvin W. Miller of Central, Principal Charles Hart of Eastern, Principal Allan Davis of Business, Principal Frank C. Daniels of Tech, Maj. A. W. Marsh, instructor at Eastern, and Maj. Raymond A. Payne, instructor at Western and McKinley.

In contrast to the blazing sun which greeted the activities of the Corps on the afternoon of the second day, was a steady downpour of rain throughout the first day. The rain began to fall about 8.15 Monday morning, and in spite of the fact that it continued well into the night, the spirit of the cadets could not be dampened.

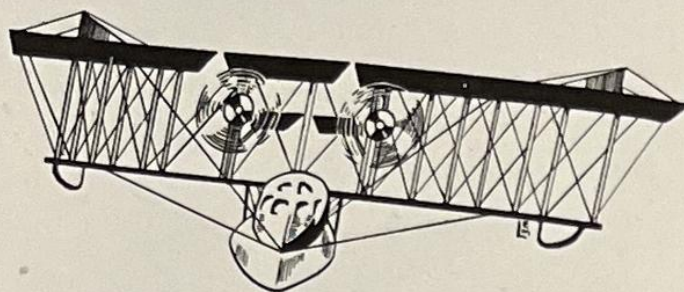

Dressed in raincoats and slickers, the three judges, Maj. Thompson Lawrence, U. S. A., Capt. Jared Wood, U. S. A., and First Lieut. C. S. Boyd, U. S. A., stuck faithfully to their work, in the face of the steady drizzle.

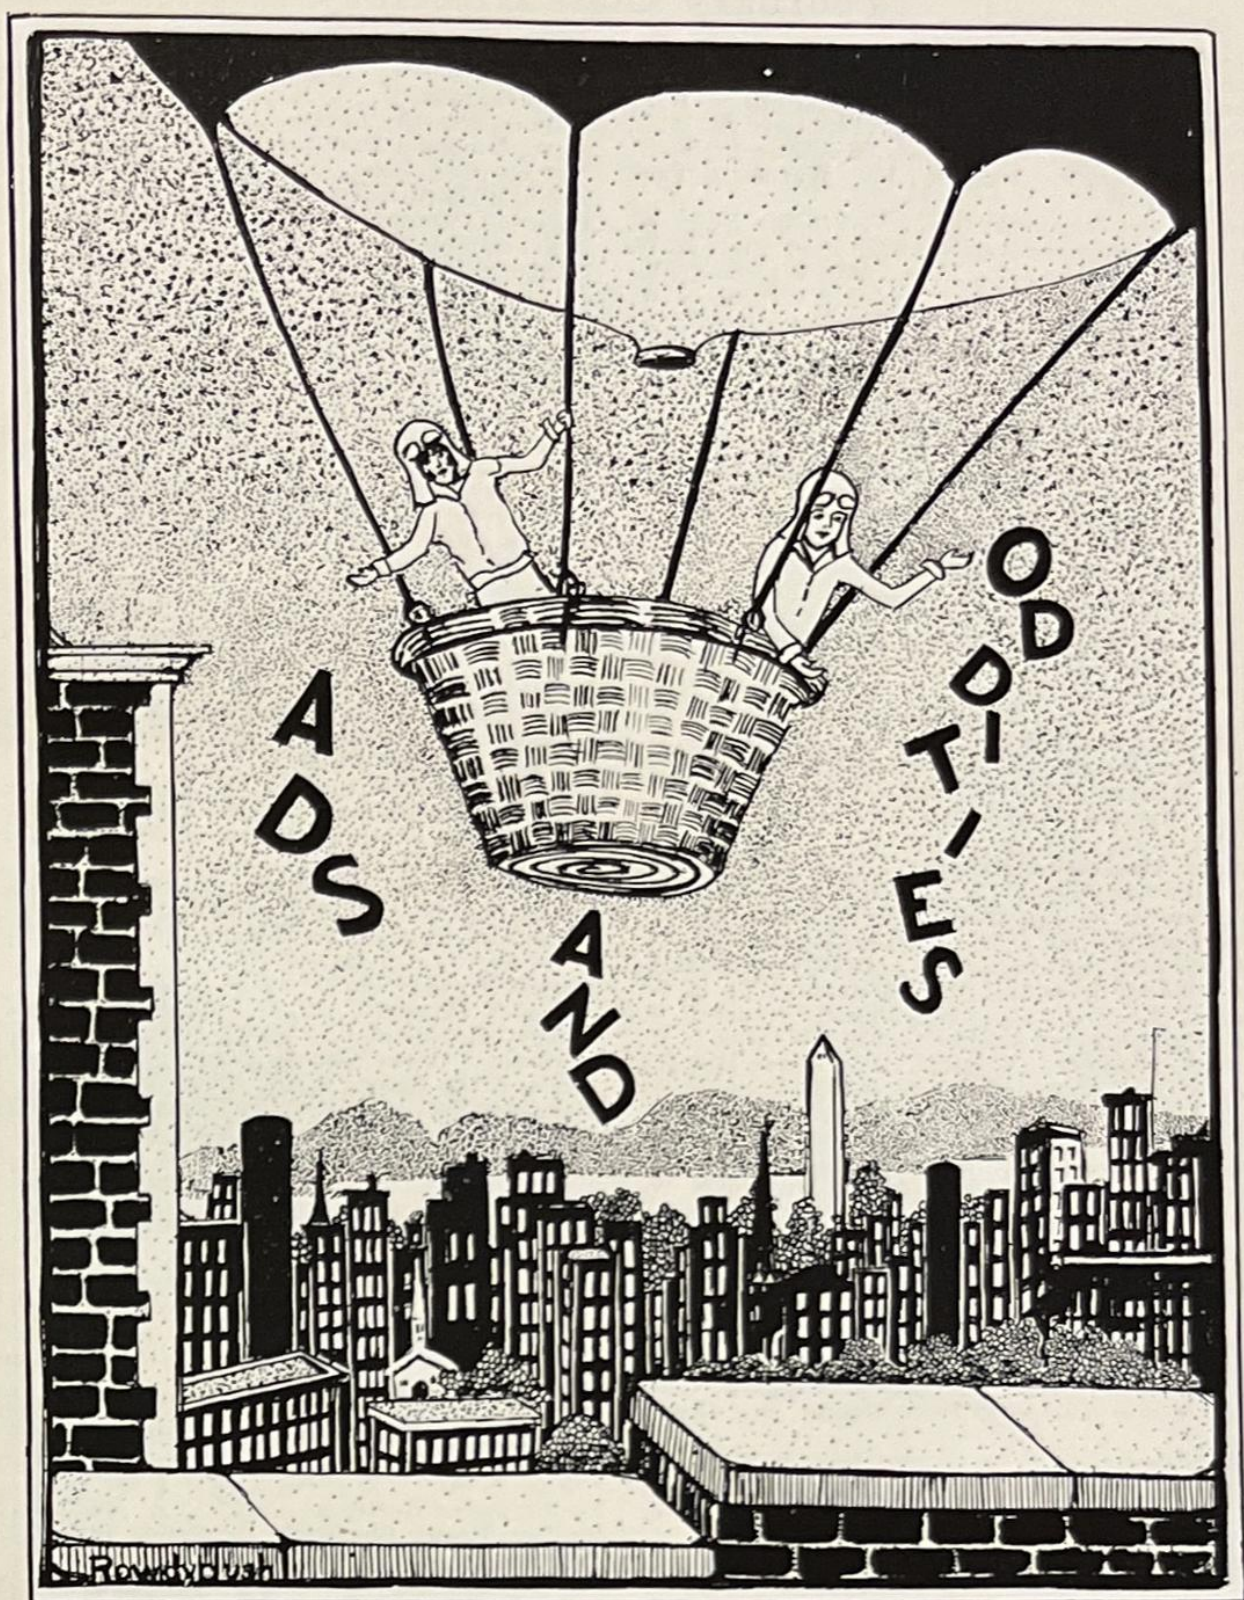

As the regiment marched back to Central to celebrate the victory won by the Company "E" boys, many seniors were taking part in the last event in their cadet life.

INSPIRATION

Backed by Ideals

A SCHOOL or an institution is in its character and methods only a reflection of the character of those who guide it through the years. Behind every institution the ideals of its business and shaping its policies, is some personality or group to whose inspiration the structure owes its existence. The founders of Southern Brothers Steward Business University—Lee P. Southern, S. C. Southern and Frank C. Steward of Business College fame—had an inspiration—the thorough business training of young men and young women.

A Single Purposed Policy

SOUTHERN BROTHERS Steward University justifies its existence because of its single purposed policy of setting the highest possible ideal before the young men and young women to give them such a thorough training in the commercial subjects and modern business practices so that when they leave the school they may find a point of contact and begin their life work with a fair prospect of success. This purpose has been steadfastly followed. Splendid successes have been invariably achieved by the school's graduates.

Every teacher a college graduate of special training and experience with either an A. B. or A. M. degree.

HE EARNS TWICE AS MUCH as his classmates who graduated at the same time he did—this young man whose picture you see above. He has found that special business training after a high school education does count—and counts a good deal. For he knows now that his value to his employer is twice that which is placed on the untrained workers in his office.

He sees young men who were seniors in his school when he was just a mere “soph”—he sees the men working for lower salaries than he obtained to start.

Why? The answer is simple. Because he did not waste any time “getting experience.” He went right ahead and learned, in a short time, those things that it would take years of experience to teach.

Wouldn't you like to know just how he did it—how hundreds of young men just out of high school are attaining success and its rewards? Even if you contemplate entering college, remember that business training will stand you in good stead always. Send for our booklet, “STEPPING STONES.” It is filled with information that concerns you. It may be the key that will open the doors of success to you. Don't hesitate; but fill in the coupon right now. It will take just a moment to mail it to us.

"One afternoon in early March we proudly received our commissions from a general of the Army, and we cherished that paper as our dearest possession, our certificate of membership, of leadership in the Cadet Corps.

"Serious work, however, called us from our reveries, and we worked hard for the Battalion Competition. It was our first big competition. At last the day came, bright, and clear, and cool. All afternoon the battalions marched on the field to the music of the competing bands. Our band was there, too, fighting hard for the prize. Each battalion drilled its best, passed in review, and marched off the field to await the final decision. When, finally, it came, Central was again the winner, and we cheered till our throats were hoarse, and counted out the money for the little gold stars on our sleeves. There was only one cloud to mar the horizon of our happiness—our band, which despite its splendid leadership, had fallen before superior numbers, and had slipped into second place.

"On the very next drill day our regiment paraded in competition, and with the spirit of old Central in the heart of every man, we came out on top, and added one more to the long list of Central victories.

"Soon after came the Brigade Review. It seemed no different then than it is today, a wonderful day, brimful of sunshine and springtime, and we paraded there so proudly, just as they are doing now; and yet all of us felt a tug at our hearts, for we knew that soon we would have to pass on, and never again know active service in our units.

"And then came the home stretch, the last few weeks before the biggest drill of all, when we toiled as never before to win, and when the day came, our last day in the Corps, we——"

But here our friend ceases to speak, and brushes a tear from his eye, and whether it is because Central lost the drill, or because of regret at leaving, we do not know; but we take a silent resolve to find out Central's standing in the drill of '28.

We should like to hear more from our friend, but the last company is passing. He goes his way, and we go ours, and the golden beams of the setting sun evoke silvery sparks from the last saluting saber.

But these fortunate few are not the only ones who view with pride and satisfaction their work of many weeks in swimming. For if you linger outside the pool-room, where, amid the pleasant hum of the electric dryers, damaged coiffures are restored and green caps rubbed dry, you may gleam from the constant chatter an understanding of the exalted position that swimming holds in the minds of Miss Moody's athletic little band.

Another kickoff. A determined attack by the Maroon and Gray. Suddenly a fumble, and a wild scramble for the elusive ball, which finally found safe haven in the arms of a Central player. Then a stocky, fair-haired youth ripped through Tech's line, hurled aside would-be tacklers, and catapulted across the last white line for another touchdown. And the crowd loudly sang the praises of "Joe" and "Gene."

The half ended; the tension relaxed; hats were playfully snatched from their owners' heads and tossed into the dugout. Fragments of paper were tossed into the air, to be borne hither and yon by the vagrant breezes. Boxes of coughdrops were consumed in a vain effort to induce a lost voice to return. The candy stand, manned by harassed-looking girls, was making a brave, though ineffectual, attempt to satisfy the hunger of the ravening horde.

"Did you see that thirty-five yard gain that Cross——?" "Simmon's playing a good game." "Two touchdowns." "Wonder what Pop Dulin thinks?" "Some game." "Our line sure is good." "Poor Tech." "Stevens went through like a cyclone." "Central chant, now, everybody in it!" "Hep, hep!"

Then the second half. There came a slow, cold, drizzling rain that turned the field into a sticky morass, but it failed to quench the ardor of the rooters. The determined offensive of the Maroon and Gray team was turned back by the impregnable defense of an even more determined Central team. Finally came the mellow note of the timekeeper's whistle, and the game was over—and won.

The Rookie, as he splashed his way up Thirteenth Street, hoarse but happy, suddenly realized that it was HIS team, that he had been watching, and it had fought for the honor of HIS school.

"Did Central win, buddy?" asked a passing stranger.

"Yes, sir," answered the Rookie, proudly. "WE beat 'em, twelve to nothing."

Sight-Seeing With Elfkin

"But," I asked, "where are the poets?" (not seeing any of those long-haired curiosities.)

"Elfkin" clapped his hands.

"Oh," cried he, "that's another story entirely!"

And, beckoning to me to follow, he ran to the stairway and started to slide swiftly down the bannisters.

It was, indeed, another story!

I slid past at least three other floors and walked some distance before we arrived at what, "Elfkin" informed me, was the "sub"-basement. I did not notice any submarines or any other ships, for that matter, but I wisely refrained from mentioning the fact.

"Here we are," exclaimed "Elfkin," gesturing grandiloquently in the direction of a kitchen sink. "The V. M. C. hold their meetings here, in this housekeeping apartment."

I raised my eyebrows, as I failed to understand the relation between amateur poets and such plebeian surroundings. (I haven't yet understood.)

"You see," he explained, as we seated ourselves comfortably on the stove, "the V. M. C.'s, that's the members of the Verse-Makers' Club, who compose so much of the poetry for the Review, meet here every Tuesday afternoon and talk over all kinds of verse forms and meters.

"By the way, did you ever hear this one?"

He assumed a very solemn expression, then quoted sentimentally:

"There is meter dactylic and meter trochaic,

"And meter for short and for long,

"But the meter of all which is least prosaic

"Is to 'meet her' by moonlight alone!"

He paused, while I applauded, then continued, "Miss Orr, who organized the club last autumn, teaches the members a great many things about versification and——"

He was interrupted by a thunderous clamor, which sounded as if a tidal wave of feet had splashed down the stairs outside the door.

Noticing my look of consternation, the elf laughed reassuringly, and exclaimed, "It's just some of the girls going to the sub-basement lockers between periods. Goodness, I almost forgot!" (he glanced reproachfully at a knot of green string which encircled his thumb). "I'm late, now, for an appointment."

"Elfkin" skipped toward the door.

"I promised a lad from another school that I'd show him the swimming pool. You can guess why I wouldn't want to miss that!" And with a quick pantomime of the act of tripping some one up, he winked suggestively at me and disappeared through the door.

As he vanished, his final words echoed back to me:

"Come back again another day,

"And we'll attempt a new survey.

"I know you envy Centralites,

"And long to share our school delights—— My word, this atmosphere is making me poetic."

And though I hadn't said so out loud, I thoroughly agreed as to the delights!

THE LIGHT OF EDUCATION

Abraham Lincoln's study was achieved by the flickering light of the cabin fire-place. No such eye-tiring handicap faces the scholar of today. A snap of a button—and the softly brilliant Electric Light of "Matchless Service" responds to the student's call for illumination.

Just a snap of a switch brings over the wire the work of labor-saving devices . . . light . . . heat . . . entertainment! But back of that switch you snap with the flip of a finger there is an investment of millions, the work of thousands, the genius of hundreds! And the cost to you, or your family's finances, is measured in mere cents—even mills!

Constantly increasing are the uses of "Matchless Service"—constantly decreasing is its cost. In the past four years its rate has been lowered a total of 41%. How few are the things you use which cost anything less than they did five years ago! NONE even approach the record for economy set by the service of the

They hesitated outside the library, watching the interweaving pattern of gay dresses contrasted with black suits. Clusters of girls and boys stood around the doorways like flowers with dark leaves.

"Well, let's plunge in for 'Diane'."

Courtney opened his arms, and abruptly they were a part of the pattern of dancers. They bumped, laughed, clawed acquaintances. Now they were near the window. A little breeze came through and lifted the damp curls on Janet's forehead. They glided on around the room. Incredible that this was the same library, marked during the day by its long, straight tables, its subdued inmates, its air of solemnity. Now its quiet boards gave back laughter and chatter and music. What did the old library think of it, anyway?

The room seemed to have no boundaries, seemed an infinity of golden floor. The music swept like a current. A red head bobbed at a distance. Janet was not interested, of course. Now the music stopped. Courtney clapped politely. Janet was so full of enthusiasm that his deliberateness made her want to shake him. If he would only go away! She did not want to dance with him all evening. It was monotonous, simply dancing in perfect time, dance after dance. She remembered other dances with Reds—how he spilled punch on his dress suit and the things he said about it—how he tried an Apache dance on a slippery surface, at a crowded party, and landed them both on the floor—how he broke off a palm leaf and used it for a fan, and was lectured by the management. But Courtney only smiled his eternal smile, without one redeeming frown. Janet wanted to cry.

"Let's sit down. It's so hot * * *" she pleaded.

She kept her eyes on the floor so that she might be spared the sight of Reds and Pat dancing together. She watched the shoes go by—silver shoes, gold shoes, black shoes. A masculine pair approached her. They stood in front of her for a moment, motionless. Then a voice said in an offended tone:

"Well, aren't you going to speak to me?"

Reds! Janet gulped and laughed nervously.

"Why, Reds, I didn't recognize your feet!"

"Big as they are!" Reds, too, was laughing nervously. "Have this dance?"

Why couldn't she refuse him? Why didn't she say her feet hurt or that she was hot or tired—why was she rising in this silly way, moving off with Reds, leaving Courtney in the background, still smiling with the steadiness of a Mona Lisa?

"Let's go on the roof—much cooler there," Reds was saying.

"I—"

Somehow they were pushing through clusters of chiffon dresses and were in the hall.

Now for the first time she looked straight at him. She saw that he was blushing—blushing horribly. She half wanted to laugh as she observed his shyness. But he said bravely, defying his shyness: "I—Janet—I don't see why we should act like the world's worst enemies * * *"

It was over. Surely they were not walking on corridor, but on air. The closed doors of classrooms flitted by, in which were imprisoned the ghosts of teachers, tests, hard problems, never again to be as powerful. Abruptly, they burst forth on a paradise of lights, music and dancing, and cool, sweet air.

"Let's just forget it and be friends again, huh, Janet?"

"I wanted to all the time," Janet tried to say, but nothing came. She grabbed Reds' hand and squeezed it in answer. They moved to the edge of the roof.

The Mid-Year Class and the Fall Review

dered about the stage and swayed back and forth in time to a solo by Mason Culverwell, joining in with him on the chorus.

Cries of "Marya!" "Marya, a dance!" brought forth a slender, graceful girl, Ruth Shaughnessy, who pirouetted about in a clever gypsy dance, flirting with and tormenting, the while, her two lovers, Boris, Gene Stevens, and Kaya, Morris Arkin. The story is woven around their love affairs and Marya's final rejection of them both and her betrothal to one of another tribe.

There were about fifty members of the cast in this scene, three of whom were members of the February class and whose pictures, together with that of Menzie Pittman and James Giuliani, appear above. The "gypsies" were: Olga Lofgren, Helen Meushaw, and Helen Perley.

A Hungarian music hall was the next of Ed Shaw's "finds."

Four attractively costumed girls gave a Hungarian peasant dance; a piano solo followed, by Dorothy Willard the first night, and by Irene Lerch the second night; a Hungarian orchestra, in which James Giuliani played, rendered the "Countess Maritza"; and a unique and graceful Russian dance by Catherine Pritchard concluded the scene.

Russia then entered in the form of that exceedingly clever little play by Anton Tchekov, "A Marriage Proposal."

Shining in all their brilliancy, the "stars" gathered at the Normandy Inn in the last scene. "Charmaine" was beautifully played on the violin by Frank Burkhart as the first number. A double quartet of picturesque peasants, namely, Rhoda Lewton, Olga Lofgren, Marjorie Miller, Alice Riley, James Butsch, Mason Culverwell, Richard Irely, and Richard Lyon, sang "Lindy Lou." A graceful, light-footed miss, Adelaide Flanagan, gave a toe dance, after which the innkeeper's daughter, Phoebe Gale, sang charmingly and quite convincingly, "C'est Vous."

Ending the show with a "bang," the whole troupe appeared in costume, joined hands across the stage and sang the "Gypsy Love Song." It was on this final bright and enchanting scene that the curtains drew slowly together—it was the end of Central's big show—the Fall Revue. A great success it was, and it will go down in history, no doubt, as one of the greatest Central had in the year 1927-1928.

HELEN PERLEY.

But today we are entering upon new phases of constitutional development. New conditions are now confronting us. We occupy the center of the world stage—the most notable experiment in representative government in the history of nations. The glory of our greatness envelops the globe, while the greatness of our Constitution is written on every page of American history. It gave Hamilton the fundamental principles with which he cleared a pathway for the growth of the new republic. It furnished Marshall the foundation for his legal interpretations. It made Lincoln a tower of strength during the Civil War. It guides every court and legislative assembly today; it is a priceless jewel which we must forever cherish, guard, and preserve.

If you would know for what the Constitution stands, go back with me to Bunker Hill, stand with me on the shell-rent sod at Gettysburg, or on the plains of Chateau Thierry, and there drink in the spirit of the fathers. There men laid down their lives, not for greed nor conquest but for right, for justice, and for man. These are the principles of our Constitution! They are ageless and deathless, and with them the republic stands; without them, it falls.

Delegates were for the second time sent to the Convention of the Columbia Press Association, and our two publications together were rated as the best in the country. Also, one of our classmates represented this section of the United States in the National Oratorical finals.

Our cadets have worked faithfully and, starting the year with ten companies for the first time, have justified our faith in them by winning practically all the preliminary drills.

And yet while we are very proud of our victories, because of the honor they bring to our school, we realize that the glory is not all our own, for what we have accomplished has been achieved through the efforts of those who taught and guided us through our high school course and instilled in us the spirit and traditions of Central.

Our history will not end with Commencement. As a result of our training in these ideals and traditions, they have become a part of us; and we, through our accomplishments, have become part of the school. The two are inseparable, and combined with the wonderful spirit of Central, have prepared us as we step out into a broader field to retain, uphold, and further the reputation we have won in the past.

R. MINOR HUDSON.

There are still other requisites, but if we shall bear these I have mentioned in mind, attainment lies within our grasp. In the lexicon of youth there is no such thing as failure unless we write it there.

So let us hope that we may go forth into the world with high hopes, strong hearts, and a grim determination to win our part of life's successes.

Central's Troopers—Past and Present

In 1927 Miss Anne McColm, Mrs. Gill, and Miss Whitford became the three guiding stars. The Fall Revue, "Seeing Stars," was more than successful, with a cast of over one hundred. "The Dragon," a play abounding in thrills, a hideous dragon, beautiful princes and princesses, was presented as the spring play. Many declared it one of the best presentations that Central has ever given, and the excellence of direction and management was apparent throughout.

Now we find that the Central High School Dramatic Association, fifty-nine years old, has obtained the Brown Cup twice, and, should it come to Central once more, it will be there forever as a reminder of the work done under the various advisers throughout these years.

DOROTHY MARIE WILLARD.

Below, vast and silent and black, stretched the city, dotted with tiny golden lights, to where the Capitol and Monument, like shining white sentinels, stood guard. Janet was fascinated by the dark potentiality of the city as it lay before her. Like the world they were to face, it was mysterious, beautiful, harboring unknown dangers. But she could not feel the danger. She could only feel the wonder and glory of it.

What was it that was running in her mind? Oh, the song * * *

"Oh, come hear the bugle crying,

"Come with your colors flying,

"Danger and death defying * * *"

Youth. * * * She and Reds—they would go out with colors flying.
